Since the European show-down last September many Europeans believe that the prospects of general war have been reduced. All the European nations have begun a frantic effort to make the best possible terms with powerful neighbors. They believe that if the British and the French couldn't risk a general war last September, then they certainly can't risk one now, after they have given away so much, strategically and morally. The readjustment to a new distribution of power in Europe is bound to be difficult and disagreeable. A lengthy period of bluffing and threats from both camps in Europe is inevitable. But Europe is accustomed to diplomatic poker games. Europe has played such games for centuries.

The majority of Europeans are thus hopeful that, if they are left to their own devices, they can compose all their present quarrels without resorting to general war. But will Europeans be left to their own devices? That is what worries them most just now. From across the Atlantic they hear a confused murmur of voices, a swelling volume which at times resembles a roar. The American people have become all excited again about Europe. And the American people, as Europeans know by experience, are unpredictable.

UNCERTAINTY DISPELLED AT MUNICH

There is one blow which the present highly explosive situation in Europe can hardly endure without disaster, and that is any large addition to the element of uncertainty. In Europe itself, uncertainty was reduced by the Munich settlement. There is nothing uncertain about Adolf Hitler's foreign policy; he wrote it all down in a book long ago, and still makes that book compulsory reading for every German. But American foreign policy is altogether another matter.

At the present time, as Europeans are vaguely aware, the United States has a New Deal government, a government dominated by men who believe in scrapping old traditions and policies of every kind. These men have suggested, by things they have done and by things they have said, that they contemplate also the possibility of scrapping the traditional American policy of isolation from European power politics.

Which causes me, Mr. President, at this point to remark that any Senator who is interested further in an expression by Demaree Bess of his slant on European affairs would do well to obtain a copy of the Saturday Evening Post of the issue of December 3, 1938, which is rather devoted to the question of power politics in Europe.

I read on:

They have said enough and done enough to set Europeans worrying again about the danger to European peace which might result from a new balance of power—the intervention of the United States in the tangled affairs of Europe.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any portion of this article which I may choose not to read, by reason of not desiring to take more of the time of the Senate than is necessary, may be incorporated in its proper place in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection—

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me inquire does the Senator mean the whole article?

Mr. NYE. I desire to put the entire article into the Record. I hope I may not have to read it all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall not object; but it is a very good advertisement for the Saturday Evening Post to publish the whole article at Government expense. However, I presume that is not a matter of interest to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. No; I am not interested in advertising the Saturday Evening Post; but the Senator from Texas seems to be very keen about doing so. Do I understand the Senator has objected to the insertion of the article in the Record?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not object. I said it was certainly a very good way of advertising the Saturday Evening Post and the article from which the Senator is reading. He seems to base his whole idea of foreign policy on this article in the Saturday Evening Post, and I am wondering what his foreign policy would have been if the article had not been printed.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, has my request been granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator said something about there being somebody who was taking us into the affairs of Europe. Who was that?

Mr. NYE. I am coming to that.

Since the British and French Prime Ministers signed the Munich agreement last September, their peoples have proved, on several different occasions that the majority of them support what was done at Munich. The British and French people have shown their approval by numerous parliamentary votes and electoral votes. Of course, there is an active and vocal minority which did not approve the Munich settlement or subsequent efforts to appease the dictators. But there can no longer be any doubt that the majority did approve.

The Munich settlement promised to keep the United States out of Europe definitely and for a long time. To some Europeans that was one of its most satisfactory results. The settlement made at Munich was orthodox power politics. It showed, as clearly as could be, that European statesmen in the so-called democracies were prepared to sacrifice much, including their principles, to avoid going to war. The majority of Americans didn't like the Munich settlement, but it wasn't an American affair. The majority of Europeans did like it. They liked it because they believed it brought them peace, and peace is what they wanted, and still want, more than anything else.

The present European policy of appeasement, however, depends upon Europe being left to solve its own problems. Those responsible for this policy left out of account the possibility of American intervention in European power politics. They were justified in assuming, after the Munich settlement, that Americans would have sense enough to mind their own business for a while. The British Prime Minister wasn't thinking about the United States when he declared that the Munich settlement had brought "peace in our time." Mr. Chamberlain seems to understand his own people better than he does Americans. Still we can pardon him for not foreseeing when he signed the Munich agreement that within a few months the American people would be more deeply involved, both emotionally and diplomatically, in the affairs of Europe than they have been since 1919. It does seem rather incredible when you come to think about it.

A SYMBOLIC SUBSTITUTION

Last September 30, the day the Munich agreement was signed, the London Times published a leading editorial which was perhaps overlooked in the excitement of the moment. The Times, which is much more influential in England than is any newspaper in the United States, practically offered up thanks in this editorial that American influence was being "liquidated" from Europe. That editorial still makes instructive reading.

It is quoted in the article.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. By the way, the London Times is a supporter of the Government, a Government newspaper, and conservative, is it not?

Mr. NYE. Quite so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And it speaks for the Chamberlain policies?

Mr. NYE. Quite so. I read from the article the editorial referred to:

The nickname of the "Big Four," which is already being given to the statesmen gathered in Munich, stirs a chord of significant memory. It carries the mind back to those negotiations in Paris which are now being partly undone. Three of the countries whose negotiators were so designated were then, as now, France, Great Britain, and Italy. The substitution of a German for an American leader in the fourth place is symbolic of much. President Wilson projected his ideas and his ideals into the peace conference; but his successors have taken no part in putting them into practice in Europe, and many were in fact still-born. Instead of an American, the fourth is now the representative of Germany, whose absence from the actual negotiations in Paris is largely responsible for the fact that Germany has been left to press revision on the rest. If the present negotiations can be regarded as at least a step toward substituting an agreed peace for an imposed peace, then they may yet come in time to be regarded as heralding the emergency of a more normally stabilized Europe.

That, Mr. President, is a quotation from a British newspaper which is spokesman for the Government. It reveals how perfectly satisfied the British Government is to mind its own business and how perfectly willing it is to try to avoid, perhaps with success, war in Europe if only the United States will keep hands out and off. Yet we are caused day after day to believe that poor France and poor England are pleading with us and urging with all the might and main they possess that we give them the helping hand which they need and which they are beseeching us to give in the name of democracy. France and England today are not one small part as much concerned about the danger of war as we in the United States are.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I wonder if the Senator noted the constant presence of our American Ambassador at the Court of St. James's, Mr. Kennedy, during the period immediately preceding and during the crisis in the latter part of September of last year?

Mr. NYE. We all noted it.

Mr. PEPPER. I wonder if the Senator thinks it was due to the aggressiveness and the excessive curiosity of the American Ambassador that he was kept so closely and so intimately concerned and informed about what was going on.

Mr. NYE. It does not seem to me that that applies to the question in hand at all.

Mr. PEPPER. I was wondering if the Senator thought that the British were relatively unconcerned about the attitude of America and, if he did so think, how he would reconcile the fact that there was hardly ever a conference of members of the British Government in September last year but that the newspapers, at least, conspicuously pointed out that the American Ambassador, Mr. Kennedy, was near at hand, and many nights in the week was to be found at No. 10 Downing Street.

Mr. NYE. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. I wonder if the Senator thinks that was some more of our "nose poking in," or whether they were very vitally concerned not only about informing us but letting us be thoroughly aware of the tragic circumstances that might result to us.

Mr. NYE. I cannot know, and do not pretend to know, what has been the occasion, what has been the cause of the invitation and pressure upon Mr. Kennedy to do whatever he has done during all the months he has been at his post in London. The suggestion of the Senator from Florida, however, does not distract me. It does not alter the situation that is presented by this editorial from the London Times, revealing that England was perfectly ready to take her own chance, without any help from the United States, in avoiding a recurrence of war in Europe.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator a moment ago made the statement that we in the United States were more concerned over war than those in France and England were last September.

Mr. NYE. No; I have not said that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I gathered that from the Senator's statement.

Mr. NYE. I said that there is more concern in the United States today about war in Europe than there is in France and England.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know how much concern there is now in France and England; but it would be very inaccurate to say that during last September, and for several months before that time, there was more concern in the United States in regard to war than there was in England or France.

Mr. NYE. No; I have not said that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows that in England people were already taking steps to live underground. They were digging cellars in Hyde Park and making provision to protect themselves from air raids. The same thing was true in Paris to a certain extent. People were even considering leaving the city and had engaged passage on ships, those arrangements being canceled after the so-called "peace of Munich."

Mr. NYE. Yes. Not so many weeks ago we had a number of Americans seeking cellars, too, after they had listened to a radio program.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there have always been Americans seeking cellars, but not always from the standpoint of war. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. For a quite different reason. There may be other reasons than one.

Going back to the article by Mr. Bess:

The United States intervened once before in the affairs of Europe, in 1917. The result, as the London Times pointed out, was "an imposed peace." We threw our immense weight into the European scale, and thus contributed handsomely to creating the mess which resulted in Europe for the following 20 years. Now, says the Times, Europe is getting down to clearing up the mess, and would like Americans please to keep out of it. Of course, that won't prevent the Times, if it suits its purpose on another occasion, from declaring, as it has done in the past, that the great democracies must stand together.

After that editorial was published, and after the Munich agreement was reached, German Nazis began the latest, and worst, of their long series of anti-Jewish pogroms. Decent people everywhere were outraged by this savagery. The policy of appeasement in Europe was seriously weakened. But the British and French people still wanted peace more than they wanted anything else, and they still supported the statesmen responsible for the appeasement policy. Decent Europeans expressed their sympathy for victims of the German outrages by such practical measures as raising money to help them and looking for some place to harbor the refugees.

At a distance, over across the Atlantic, we Americans became much more excited about the German pogroms than the people of any European country. We indulged ourselves in an emotional orgy such as European peoples no longer can afford. Americans are accustomed to express their feelings strongly on such occasions. But to those who watched our country from across the Atlantic at this time, as I did, our emotional orgy did not seem to be entirely spontaneous. There was evidence that the feelings of the American people were being whipped up, and prolonged, by interested groups and individuals, for purposes of their own. It is this phase of American reaction to the German pogroms which has excited intense interest, and much apprehension, among Europeans.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it the idea of the Senator from North Dakota, in line with his argument, that there will be perfect peace and harmony in Europe if the United States will just let Europe alone?

Mr. NYE. It is my argument that there is large hope in Europe of maintaining peace there if only the United States will keep its hands out and off.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I was getting at. In other words, the view of the Senator from North Dakota is that the peaceful and God-fearing and God-loving nations of Europe, who are seeking and bending all their efforts to maintain and bring about peace, will really realize peace unless this monster of North America intervenes and brings on a bloody war in Europe? Is that the attitude of the Senator?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not have to confirm anything the writer of this article has said. I am only reciting it as an excellent example to substantiate my position when I contend that I am not alone, that I am not flippant or careless or prejudiced, when I declare it to be my opinion that the largest chance for peace in Europe lies in the United States keeping its hands out of the difficulties that exist there at this very moment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very much concerned about this matter. I want to see peace just as much as does the Senator from North Dakota. I sometimes think I have a greater desire for peace than he has.

If what has just been said is true, will the Senator from North Dakota tell the rest of us Senators—we who do not know about these international questions, we who do not have access to avenues of secret influence which some Senators seem to possess—what anybody in this Government is doing to bring about war in Europe? If the Senator will help point him out, I will—

Mr. NYE. Why, Mr. President, we have seen officials of the United States Government stand up on this side of the Atlantic and, with their thumbs to their noses, seemingly twiddle their fingers and apply names to those on the other side of the Atlantic. We have seen examples of that kind again and again and again. We have seen men rise and heard them say, "We dislike this government and we dislike that government. We do not want anything to do with it. We will not tolerate its theories." Then the Senator from Texas asks, "What is our Government doing to make more difficult the accomplishment of peace in Europe?" when Europe, since the experience at Munich, is obviously settling down to the task of ironing out its difficulties without resort to war.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will permit me to continue, I did not quite finish my question.

If the Senator will point out anybody in a responsible position—I am not talking about lecturers on Chautauqua circuits, and things like that, who express an opinion, but I mean any responsible officer of the United States Government—any officer of the State Department, President, Senator, Representative, anybody who has any authority and whose word carries any weight, who is seeking to meddle in the political affairs of Europe, seeking to bring about a war, seeking to interject America into a war or to foment a war, I shall be the first man to assist in pillorying him and arraigning him before the bar of his country for these unworthy, improper actions.

I should love to know who is doing anything of that kind. I should love to have the Senator tell us who it is. I do not know. Who is it?

Mr. NYE. It is very strange that the Senator from Texas does not know. He seemingly has not read the addresses of Members of the Cabinet in this administration, addresses by men who hold high positions, ranking positions in congressional circles, who have given vent to feelings of displeasure and distrust that can have no other effect than to provoke a misunderstanding and a lack of understanding that is not going to be to the advantage of Europe, or, more than that, to the advantage of the people of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. In a civil society, we protect what we call the privilege of free speech; that is to say, the right of the individual citizen to get up and say that he is opposed in principle to a certain course of action. I hope there is no prohibition in the mind of the Senator from North Dakota against American citizens, or even American officials, saying in the world forum, as it were, that they do not approve the course of a nation that makes force an instrument of national policy; that they do not approve any nation that literally makes a scrap of paper out of a sacred treaty; that they do not approve a people who destroy the privilege of freedom of religious worship; that they do not approve the policy of a government that obliterates the principle of self-determination, which we know as the right of the individual citizen to have something like freedom in his individual life. The Senator is not shocked that American citizens should express opinions such as that in the world forum, is he?

Mr. NYE. No. What does shock me is that men who occupy positions that are high in the administration, those who more directly shape its foreign policies, give themselves over to utterances of that kind, and are not challenged, are not in anywise interfered with by the administration. There is no word of protest against such utterances.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield only once more?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. At least contemporaneously with utterances that have emanated from this country, if not prior to utterances from this country, did not the dictators of Europe sneer at the "weak, inefficient, impotent" democracies of the world?

Mr. NYE. I do not know. We have had reports to the effect that they have done so. It would not surprise me if they have. They certainly have been invited upon endless occasions to pay their disrespects to some particular democracies.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Does not the Senator think the things he has been pointing out are evidences of antagonism toward a government rather than expressions of a policy to intervene in the affairs of a government?

Mr. NYE. Antagonism toward a government?

Mr. MINTON. Antagonism toward a government; yes, or policies of a government, by individuals, rather than the advocacy of any policy of intervention.

Mr. NYE. The language has not always taken on that hue at all.

Mr. MINTON. Has anybody, so far as the Senator knows, advocated our intervention in the affairs of Europe? That is what the Senator has been talking about. I have been listening, trying to find out who it is.

Mr. NYE. No; I have not argued that anyone was calling for intervention in Europe on the part of the United States.

Mr. MINTON. I asked the Senator awhile ago that very question; I had it written out; and he told me to postpone the question for a few minutes and he would tell me. I am listening, and the Senator has not yet told us.

Mr. NYE. I am placing this article by Mr. Bess in the RECORD for the purpose of substantiating the belief, the fear that exists in Europe that the United States is getting ready to push Europe into something that Europe herself does not want to be moved into.

Yesterday I was challenged on the floor of the Senate because I had made a statement that it was my opinion that there would not be any war in Europe this spring, this year, or next year, unless and until the United States was ready to give the word "go", or until Europe was ready to assume that the United States would be ready to pitch in and lend a hand when the time came.

I want to show, contrary to the contention which has been offered in the Senate, that I am not the only one who is entertaining that kind of conviction; but that if I am dealing in palaver, in irresponsible language, careless language, flip-pant language, loose, prejudicial, alarming, and unsubstantiated language, there are others who are doing likewise.

It has been argued that there was not foundation for the statement that was mine. I am offering this article by Mr. Bess as convincing evidence that there is foundation upon which one may build a declaration that the future of Europe, its immediate future, is very largely in America's hands today.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, did I misunderstand the Senator a while ago? When I asked him the question, Who in America is advocating our intervention in the affairs of Europe? did I misunderstand the Senator when I thought he said that somebody in America was advocating our intervention in Europe, somebody in official position?

Mr. NYE. My undertaking was to declare that there were those who were saying things and doing things which had a tendency to carry us off in the direction of intervention in Europe, and by word of mouth there is a degree of intervention; yes. Certainly, through the mouths of some of our spokesmen in this country, we are not conducting a mind-our-own-business policy, as Europe is evidently hoping and wishing so much we would.

Mr. MINTON. What I am trying to ascertain is whether or not someone in this country is advocating our intervention in the affairs of Europe.

Mr. NYE. I have heard no such advocacy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. Gladly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the Senator read the repeated statements in the columns of some of the columnists who may be taken as almost professional boosters of the present American Ambassador to France, Mr. William Bullitt, in which they repeatedly boast that Mr. Bullitt is an unofficial member of the French Cabinet, just as the boosters of Mr. Walter Hines Page, after he had participated in the involvement of the United States in the World War, said he had been an unofficial member of the British Cabinet during the time he was accredited to that Government?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. In answer to the Senator from Missouri, later on I shall read from Mr. Bess' article a reference to how Europe looks upon the utterances of Mr. Jay Franklin as those of an American writer who is presumed to be very close to the throne here in America.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not happen to know much about Mr. Demaree Bess, which may be an indictment of my general fund of knowledge; but I have no doubt that, if given a little time, any of us here could produce an article in some other magazine taking exactly the opposite course from that which is being taken by this particular writer in the Saturday Evening Post. It will take more than the opinion of any writer in any magazine to convince me that Europe is becoming impatient with anything we are doing or saying in the United States.

I do not know who began this face-making business, whether it was somebody in Europe or somebody in the United States, the expressions of opinion not approving certain forms of government. I remember that for a long time we did not accord recognition to the Government of Russia because we did not approve the form of government they had, the policies they advocated. That might have been regarded as sticking our nose into the internal affairs of Russia, and a good many people took the position that we had no right to withhold recognition because we did not approve their form of government.

I remember that when I was a much younger man there were Armenian troubles across the seas, and men in public places, distinguished men whose word carried weight, spoke and wrote against the atrocities which were being visited upon the Armenians.

We have not always kept our tongues when something was in progress somewhere in the world which we regarded as an invasion of the rights of the people or as an act of injustice or brutality.

I did not hear the speeches, and probably would not have understood them if I had heard them unless I had had an interpreter, but I have heard of speeches being made in certain countries of Europe by the responsible heads of the governments referring to congresses and parliaments as "gab-fests," as indulging in parliamentary gabble and prattle, and heaping opprobrium upon the democratic theory. That was just as much an injection of their opinions into our domestic affairs as it is to take the opposite course when defending democracy—which is under widespread attack all over the world from insidious invasions—mental, physical, or otherwise, of the theory which we hold dear, and for which our Nation is supposed to stand.

I do not think it is quite fair to say that because outstanding citizens, or even members of the Cabinet in delivering addresses, express their views as to a preference between democracy and dictatorship, between the right of all the people to participate in their government and the right of only one or a small group to dictate to them, that is necessarily an injection of themselves into the internal affairs of any other nation. It is a defense of the theory upon which our Government is based. It is an intellectual defense, it is a defense in reason and in morality, and when it is tendered in language which is appropriate, I think it is worthy of our institutions.

It seems to me it would be a sad world, indeed, if anyone who had the capacity to discuss these principles and these policies, and the difference between democracy and autocracy, should have his mouth closed for fear he might offend someone in some other country who did not agree with him.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I wish to restate the purpose which is mine in offering this informative article for the RECORD, for the information of the Senate. I should not be undertaking it, I should not be taking the time of the Senate, except for the fact that the record as it stands today indicates that my declaration that Europe's peace was so largely dependent upon the United States keeping its hands off was justified, more than justified; that there are others, many others, who are entertaining a like conviction, and that it is not a matter of recklessness, it is not a matter of palaver, it is not a matter of flippancy, which prompts me, any more than it is such a thing that prompts others to give voice and vent to their feeling as to the direction that is being pursued in an international way today.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield.

Mr. WALSH. Has not the Senator heard on the floor of the Senate, and has he not read in the press and heard from many sources, including, perhaps, innumerable letters, statements, and arguments, to the effect that it would be the duty of this country, in the event of war or threatened war in Europe between Germany and Italy on the one side and Great Britain and France on the other, to lend aid, to lend money, as one Senator said today, to give our moral support, and be prepared to go to war, if necessary, to defend our democracy?

Mr. NYE. We have heard that.

Mr. WALSH. How can anyone expect the Senator from North Dakota and others who feel that that is a dangerous and destructive and war-provoking attitude to remain silent and not raise their voices in protest against such propaganda?

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator. Of course, I cannot remain silent when, as has been done by some in this country, my motives have been questioned in my expression of the belief to which I gave utterance day before yesterday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. Most happily do I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When we have heard in the Senate, or as American citizens read in the newspapers, and seen an officer of the President's Cabinet, as did Secretary Ickes last fall, indulge in terms of billingsgate against a nation with which we are at peace; when we hear the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate of the United States on every possible occasion make the most provocative possible statements with regard to nations with which we are at peace; when we hear a Senator respected by everyone in this body rise here, as he did today, and with great intrepidity ride through blood up to his bridle bits in this Chamber and gallantly say he was not afraid to send every American boy to die on foreign fields—if that statement and that succession of statements are not challenged in this body, would not every other nation in the world be entitled to take them as expressive of the undivided opinion of the American people?

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me on another matter—the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has left the Chamber, but he suggested earlier in the day that he hoped the Senate might adjourn early tomorrow in order to permit Senators to attend the dedication of the Yankee Clipper at Bolling Field in the District of Columbia. I had shared in that hope earlier, but I wish to say at this time that in the absence of the possibility of concluding the consideration of the pending bill today I do not think we would be justified in recessing or adjourning early tomorrow in order to permit Senators to attend some function while we are still working on the bill with the hope that we may pass it tomorrow. It is perfectly obvious that we can do very little on Saturday because of the joint celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of Congress. Therefore I hope we may devote ourselves diligently to the bill tomorrow in an effort to conclude its consideration.

I hope to secure an agreement later for a limitation of debate tomorrow after some hour which may be agreed upon.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield for a question?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator made the remark, "If America would keep her hands off." In the exchange of remarks which has taken place just now has that phrase, "If America would keep her hands off," been satisfactorily explained, or clarified, or is there something else in the picture which we do not understand?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, a keep-hands-off policy can mean so much that separate consideration is owing to that subject alone. This afternoon I am trying to confine myself to a picture of those things which are taking place, which have the result in Europe of causing people to question what are the American motives. What is America's interest? What is America going to do in the present emergency? There are those who are giving testimony upon testimony that Europe is praying for us to keep our hands off, and keep out, and let them settle the thing now, as they think they can do it, without resort to war.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NYE. I wish greatly that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] were now present, if for no other purpose than to hear the one paragraph I am about to read:

This apprehension might well extend also to every American who wants to prevent his country from getting into, or even actually precipitating, a European and a World War. I believe that the events of the past few months, since the Munich settlement, can be woven into a strong argument to support the thesis that uncertainties and shifts in American foreign policy are more dangerous today to world peace than any other factor in the world situation.

"What a loose, flippant statement," I suppose some would say.

Unless the American people understand and exercise control over individuals and forces which are impelling them today into the thick of power politics, we may find ourselves not only participating in a European war, as we did in 1917, but actually starting one.

There are three elements which are contributing largely to the creation of this new and dangerous American foreign policy. The first of these is an immense increase of popular interest in foreign affairs, due to the perfection of such new mediums of communication as radio broadcasting and talking newsreels. This popular interest is, naturally, not yet well informed, because these new mediums, so far, have generated more heat than light. In the hands of unscrupulous agitators, our new emotional attitude toward Europe can be exploited for sinister purposes.

One of my American acquaintances, who has worked in Europe for years, told me about an experience he had a few months ago when he went back on a visit to his home in Kansas. The last time he was in Kansas, he said, the people hardly knew Europe existed, and certainly it had never entered their heads that it was their business to do anything about the nonsense which goes on over there.

But Kansas has been transformed, our exile reported. The Kansans have discovered Europe, and are taking their discovery very seriously. My American acquaintance visited his aged grandmother in a small Kansas town, and found her very much wrought up indeed. She had acquired a tremendous hate for Benito Mussolini. The old lady has always been contrary, her grandson declared, so she picked out Mussolini as her pet hate, because all the other Kansans in that little town were engaged in hating Adolf Hitler.

POLITICIAN'S FIELD DAY

"Grandma still has a very active mind, despite her age," her devoted grandson told me. "She was thinking about organizing some kind of crusade to rescue the poor Italians from Mussolini. I said to her: 'But, grandma, I don't believe you ever saw an Italian. Why are you so excited about them?' And she replied: 'I don't like that man Mussolini. I don't like the way he talks on the radio, and I don't like the way he acts in newsreels. I get mad every time I see his picture. I don't like the way he picks on those poor Italians, turning them into his slaves.'"

This old lady in Kansas might have gone on cheerfully all her life without worrying about Mussolini and the Italians if the radio and talking newsreel had not come along to stir her up.

But the old lady in Kansas, and millions like her, are being aroused by something more than new mediums for making Europe vivid to them. All sorts of persons, sincere and insincere, organized and unorganized, are exploiting the new feelings of our people for all they are worth. The activities of these individuals and groups constitute the second element influencing our foreign policy.

The intense emotional reaction of our people to German anti-Jewish outrages has provided a field day for our politicians, local and national. Naturally, they are not going to overlook such an opportunity to win easy applause, whether or not they really have any feelings about the matter. Only responsible politicians worry about the future of their country; irresponsible ones are thinking only about their own present.

And our country, like every other country, possesses its full share of irresponsible politicians. They are feeding the violent popular prejudices and passions in every part of our country. Some of them act like this simply because they want to achieve a little easy popularity; some give way to their personal emotions without any thought of the consequences to their country. There is nothing new about this; irresponsible politicians have always acted this way. But such action is more dangerous now, because of the critical world situation, than it has been in the past. Prof. Tyler Dennett once summed up American foreign policy in a single sentence, "If we are asked to put up or shut up, we do neither." We have been able to apply such a policy in the past, but it is a question whether we can still do so in the future. Lack of restraint is never an admirable quality; in an emergency it may prove disastrous.

In addition to politicians, whose actions usually are more irresponsible than calculated, the United States is honeycombed with organized minorities and interests which seek, for one reason or another, to involve our country in European politics. Several of these minorities have intensified their activities since the Munich settlement, because that settlement represented for them a disastrous defeat. The sincerity of most of these groups is not questioned; their sincerity makes them all the more effective in persuading the American people that it is their duty to intervene in the affairs of Europe.

The largest of these minorities is that rather unwieldy mass known as anti-Fascists. This group includes a little bit of everything, but its hard core is the Communist Party. To the Communists the peace of Munich was a crushing blow. European Communists have been playing a central role in European power politics for years as the pawn of Soviet Russia. The Munich settlement smashed them flatter than a pancake and pushed Russia out of Europe. Even worse, the peace of Munich granted Germany a free hand in eastern Europe and practically invited her to carve a piece out of Russia if she could.

Communists in the United States and everywhere else naturally are going to do everything possible to head off Germany before she gets her hands on the Soviet Ukraine. To Communists Russia is the "Socialist fatherland," more dear to them than their own countries. They are internationalists in theory, but in practice they are Soviet Russian patriots of the most chauvinistic type. A convinced Communist would never hesitate to do anything possible to drag his own country into any war anywhere on the side of Russia. American Communists have built up a whole flock of subsidiary organizations, camouflaged so as not to scare off timid people, but all designed to swing sentiment in our country behind Soviet Russia and against Russia's actual or potential enemies.

BELLIGERENT PEACEMAKERS

Another large and even more unwieldy minority which wants the United States to play an active part in European power politics is that which believes in preventive war of one kind or another. The center of this group at present is the belligerent wing of our so-called peace societies. These good people were bewildered for a time, after the peace of Munich, but now they are once again in full cry. The German outrages have given them another chance. Most of these societies have international affiliations, and one can, perhaps, see what they are doing more clearly in Europe than in the United States, because their central committees are located in Europe.

The majority of members in their European branches belong to political parties which oppose the present governments in France and Great Britain, and disapprove the whole policy of appeasement. For that reason, they are eager to convince their own people that the United States will line up with European democracies against Germany, Italy, and Japan if only the European democracies drop their appeasement policy. The actions of the American groups, whether they are aware of it or not, are tending to bring us not only into European international politics but also into the domestic politics of the European democracies. We Americans, who are resentful of the slightest hint of European interference in our own domestic politics, are now being persuaded that we should take sides in the domestic politics of European democracies.

Many other American groups have an interest, emotional or calculated, in pushing our country into European politics. Our large Jewish population, naturally, cannot remain neutral in questions involving National Socialist Germany, which has dubbed itself the "anti-Semitic fatherland." They would be more than human if they remained aloof from European disputes, at least in spirit. Our population is compounded of racial groups which have their roots in Europe, and the influence of such groups must inevitably be felt in times of flux and emergency.

MINIONS OF MARS

Our politicians and reformers have persistently warned us in the past of the pernicious influence of munitions interests. We haven't heard much about that influence recently. But does anyone imagine that munitions interests are anxious to throw oil on the troubled waters at a time when the majority of Americans have been persuaded that we need more of every kind of defensive weapon—ships and guns and airplanes, submarines, and tanks? And will our big Navy people, our preparedness people of every kind, miss such an opportunity to play upon our fears and our wrath? These people assure us that they are doing it all for our own good, and thus justify to themselves preposterous exaggeration of imminent perils from abroad.

But the widening sympathies of the American people for Europeans and their problems, and the persistent insidious efforts of organized minorities to use those sympathies to lure us into other people's quarrels, might still not be a menace to the peace of our country if a third element did not exist which, combined with the other two, seems to constitute a high explosive of incalculable danger. That third element is the gradual development in the minds of some of our influential political leaders of a messianic complex. Evidence accumulates that a notion is gaining ground in Washington that the American people are destined to inspire and assist one group of European nations to fight with another group.

Last December a Paris newspaper quoted Jay Franklin, described as "spokesman for President Roosevelt's New Deal advisers," as portraying an amazing picture of the foreign policy being worked out at Washington since Munich. The forthcoming visit of the British King and Queen to the United States, said Mr. Franklin, is the first development in a duel between the United States and Germany for influence over the British Empire. He added: "American success in this duel will realign British policy with that of the democratic nations of the western world. Failure may well result in the disguised partition of the Empire into two spheres of influence—with the self-governing Dominions following the lead of Washington and relying on America for defense, and the Asiatic and African possessions of Britain drifting under joint Anglo-German hegemony." He then added this almost incredible statement:

"The object of Roosevelt diplomacy is to use the common sentiments and free institutions of England, the Dominions, and the United States to resolidify the Empire as a major political institution, and so to reestablish the United Kingdom as our 'buffer state' against European aggression."

This pronouncement of some of our master minds in Washington was read with bewilderment and concern by those Europeans who still hope for peace. Knowing their own history, Europeans were better equipped than most Americans to understand what such an American policy would mean. It would mean that the United States would assume a dominant role in European power politics. It would mean that the United States would step into the role of arbiter of Europe, so recently vacated by Great Britain at the Munich conference. It would mean the United States would presume to interfere in the domestic politics of certain European countries to compel them to change their foreign policies to suit the wishes of the United States. In the end, of course, it would mean war.

No wonder that Europeans, reading such pronouncements from Washington are becoming increasingly alarmed by the prospects of another American intervention in Europe's affairs. No wonder that the minority parties in Great Britain and France, who resist the policy of appeasement, are beginning to turn with renewed hope toward the United States. After the Munich settlement, those minority parties thought that their countries had forfeited any chance of assistance from the United States. In those days, British and French Socialist and liberal parties turned hopefully toward Soviet Russia, and never mentioned us. But now we have come back into their political picture again. Last December, the leader of the French Socialist Party, M. Léon Blum, successfully urged a majority of his followers to approve a resolution calling for an alliance with the United States and Soviet Russia, and to turn down a resolution calling for bargaining with Germany. The rumors about our new foreign policy became so disturbing to the British statesmen responsible for the appeasement scheme that they sent Capt. Anthony Eden, former British Foreign Secretary, on a hurried visit to the United States to report just how matters stood. It would be interesting to know what Captain Eden reported to Neville Chamberlain when he returned from America.

THE MESSIANIC COMPLEX

Messianic complexes can get a powerful hold upon nations as well as upon individuals. And history shows us that the results invariably are disagreeable, if not disastrous. Skimming recently through H. G. Wells' Outline of History, I came upon a passage dealing with the conception of the "white man's burden," which seemed peculiarly appropriate to some of the present American tendencies in foreign policy.

In the closing years of the nineteenth century, Mr. Wells recalls, the peoples of Europe got the idea that they were somehow superior to all other peoples, and it was, therefore, assumed to be a natural and inevitable thing that all the world should fall under European domination. Mr. Wells then quoted the passage which seems relevant to our own situation today: "With a reluctant benevolent effort the European mind prepared itself to take up what Rudyard Kipling called 'the white man's burden'—that is to say, the lordship of the earth. The powers set themselves to this enterprise * * * with half-educated or illiterate populations at home, with a mere handful of men, a few thousand at most, engaged in scientific research, with their internal political systems in a state of tension or convulsive change, with a creaking economic system of the most provisional sort, and with their religions far gone in decay."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. For fear that they may be some misunderstanding, in view of some of the remarks which have just been made in debate between certain Senators on the floor as to why I made the speech on the floor of the Senate yesterday, and in view of the fact that I think part of the argument has gone far afield of the inquiry I made in my speech of yesterday, and in view of the fact that I do not disagree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] or the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] with respect to what should be done on the part of the United States of America to avoid the possibility of sending American boys into foreign fields, I again, Mr. President, want to refer to the statement made by the junior Senator from North Dakota on the floor of the Senate day before yesterday. This is the statement which provoked the speech made by the junior Senator from the State of Illinois.

Up to this time that statement has not been explained sufficiently to convince me. The statement which was made then is as follows:

I am more and more convinced that there will be no war in Europe this spring, this year, or next year, unless the United States encourages, urges, and eggs Europe on to it. There will be no war in Europe unless the United States shows a definite will to help out when war comes, and an inclination to finance it. There will surely be a war in Europe—when the United States gives the word "go" and gives Europe reason to anticipate that the United States will be standing by and ready to go on when the hour comes.

So the junior Senator from North Dakota says:

The question I asked, to which I desire an answer, as other Senators on the floor would like an answer, is: Who is it in the United States Government at the present time who is going to give that word "go"? It seems as though the Senator from North Dakota has the answer, and if he has it, I am interested, and he is interested, the Senate is interested, the people of the United States of America are interested to know if some sinister influence exists in this country which is ready to give the word "go" and which controls the destiny of Europe so far as a world war is concerned.

Mr. NYE. I would, if there were call for it, reiterate my statement of day before yesterday, which has just been quoted. Every hour there comes to me a stronger conviction that today peace in Europe is very, very largely dependent upon the ability of the United States to keep its hands out and its nose out of European affairs, and I say that without undertaking to indicate that there might not arise circumstances abroad which would find us wanting to alter that kind of a position. But I want to have the question weighed long and carefully before ever we permit ourselves to do what we were made to do some 20 years ago, with no good result that we can point to today as a consequence of our action.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the last statement made by the Senator from North Dakota; but that does not answer the question.

Mr. NYE. The Senator is going to get an answer, and a very direct answer, to his question before this day is over.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well. I think the Senate of the United States and the people of the country are entitled to a full explanation of that statement; for, if there are any officials in this Government, from the President down, who are at this time ready to say the word "go," so far as involving America in a European war is concerned, certainly the junior Senator from Illinois, as well as the junior Senator from North Dakota and everyone else, want to know about that.

As I said in my speech yesterday, insofar as I am concerned, I will vote billions of dollars if necessary for an adequate national defense of this country to the end that no foreign intruder, whether he be from England or France or Germany or Italy or any other nation, shall ever step his belligerent foot upon American soil, but I will not vote one dime to send American boys across the sea to pull the chestnuts of any nation out of the fire. Because of my views and because I considered that the Senator from North Dakota made a most serious and grave statement, I felt that it was my duty to challenge his position, and I still call at this hour for an explanation of the statement made by him.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I wish to hurry so I may get to my more direct answer to the Senator from Illinois. I read the concluding paragraphs:

Mr. Wells, the historian, finds it hard to believe that men could be so naive as his fellow Europeans were in the late nineteenth century. He shows that a few men had selfish interests in encouraging the conception of the white man's burden, but that the European peoples as a whole sincerely believed that they were entrusted by destiny with an obligation to manage the affairs of the races of Africa and Asia for the good of the Africans and Asiatics.

MINDING OUR OWN BUSINESS

Perhaps some future historian will find equal difficulty in understanding the similar belief which has got hold recently in the United States, the belief that Americans are destined to rescue some of these same European nations from their enemies, to uphold one set of European nations against another set because one set is labeled "democracies" and the other set is labeled "dictatorships." Some of our leaders and some of our organized minorities are urging us to take up the burden of saving democracy by invading Europe again.

That is a pretty careless remark on the part of this eminent author.

We are being urged to do this when our domestic situation offers all sorts of complications; when we have enough uncompleted work at home to keep us busy for generations, just as the European nations had when they assumed the "white man's burden."

The majority of men and women in European democracies have made it clear since the peace of Munich that they don't want to be rescued from their own statesmen by the American people or any other outsiders. They do desire, if it is possible, to make a peaceful deal with the "have not" powers, which happen also to be dictatorships. They are endeavoring frantically to make such a deal without giving up too large a share of the spoils in the World War of which the "have not" powers now demand a cut. This bargaining process is very painful, and we may expect to hear loud yelps from Europe for some time.

It seems to be a suitable moment for the United States to stay completely out of European affairs, instead of thinking up all sorts of new schemes for getting into power politics under the guise of crusades. But certain types of reformers are incorrigibly determined to reform other people whether they like it or not. I am reminded of a remark I heard one evening in Moscow by Hal Denny, correspondent for the New York Times. The Bolsheviks had simultaneously announced a new "democratic" constitution and the arrest of several hundred political opponents. Said Denny: "These Bolsheviks are going to give their people democracy if they have to put them all in jail to do it." Some of our reformers are determined to give other peoples democracy, even if they have to wage a world war in the process.

I submit the article as a whole as being most worthy of the reading of every Member of this Congress.

Mr. President, may I inquire how long it is intended that the Senate shall remain in session? For the information of the majority leader, I have yet to deliver remarks which I anticipate will require an hour, if not a little more. Naturally, I should much prefer to resume tomorrow. However, if the Senator is desirous of continuing the session and thinks that by proceeding further tonight we may finish our work tomorrow afternoon in time to take advantage of the invitation which has been extended to visit the Clipper, I am willing to proceed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, we cannot finish our work tomorrow in time to take advantage of the suggestion to adjourn in order to see the christening of the Clipper. As I said a while ago in response to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], inasmuch as we probably cannot do anything more on Saturday than to engage in the joint celebration in the House Chamber, I do not feel that we ought to adjourn tomorrow in order to attend the ceremony in connection with the christening of the Clipper, unless consideration of the bill should have been finished. I do not see any hope of finishing it in time to do that.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator's position, and I concur in his judgment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am anxious that we conclude the consideration of the bill tomorrow. Otherwise, it will have to go over until Monday. Other legislation is coming on. When the Senator began this afternoon, I was advised that he expected to occupy only an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. NYE. The Senator has observed what has been happening in my time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. Of course, Senators always try to be courteous. However, we all have control of our time. I had hoped that beginning at 1 o'clock tomorrow we could have a limitation of debate during the rest of the consideration of the bill. If the Senator has another hour of remarks in his system, I shall not try to keep the Senator here long enough to finish tonight. I did hope to continue until 5 o'clock.

Mr. NYE. I certainly should not want to proceed at this time for only 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, how many more speeches will there be?

Mr. BARKLEY. Each new day brings a new problem. There are to be at least two or three more that I know of, and there may be others that I do not know of.

Mr. WALSH. One inspires another.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no way of projecting my eyes into the bosoms of my colleagues and seeing what is going on there. My guess is that four or five more speeches are on tap.

Mr. NYE. If I should conclude tonight, would that mean that I alone would be responsible for failure on the part of the Senate to enjoy the program tomorrow; or does the Senator feel that others would be responsible as well?

Mr. BARKLEY. Frankly, I do not feel that we can get through under any circumstances in time to attend the ceremony tomorrow.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

AVIATION UP TO DATE

Mr. LUNDEEN. In line with the statement of the majority leader, the able Senator from Kentucky, I think as many Senators as possible should see the Clipper. I think it is in line with the program which we are now discussing. I am an aviation enthusiast. Aviation is a weapon of defense. It is not a weapon which can be launched across the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans with bombs to drop upon another country. There is not a plane built today in possession of any nation that can carry a full crew, a full load of bombs, and gas enough even to cross an ocean let alone returning to its base after gaining its objective. Every time you put a bomb on board and put men on board you take off gas. Everyone knows that, or should know it. Aviation is purely a defensive weapon to protect our coasts. I think we should go and see the new developments in aviation for our own instruction.

DEFENDING FRENCH IMPERIALISM

While I am on my feet, so long as the Senator has read about defending democracies in Europe, I ask, just what democracies are referred to? I do not want to go into that question at any length. It seems to me that the nations which are referred to as democracies are empires—world-wide, far-flung empires. France is an empire. That empire has been won by conquest and aggression. The swords of the French imperialists are dripping with blood. They have acquired their territory by aggression. That empire extends into Asia, Africa, and America. It is not European alone; it is world-wide. France is an empire won by aggression and war, and everyone knows it, or should know it.

DEFENDING BRITISH IMPERIALISM

The far-flung Empire of Britain, scattered over one-third of this mighty earth, upon which the sun never sets, was won by aggression and war. It was won by bloodshed, won by swords dipped into the blood of nations now enslaved by that empire; and yet we hear Senators and Representatives talk about defending these "democracies"! If that be democracy, God save the word!

We have a democracy here. Let us save that democracy. Let us attend to our own affairs and preserve and protect our own people, including our 12,000,000 unemployed.

WE ARE SWORN TO UPHOLD OUR OWN DEMOCRACY

If we enter another destructive world war, democracy may disappear from the earth. We may scrap our own institutions. We may ruin the work that our fathers and founders laid down in this country, which they have bequeathed to us, which it is our sacred duty to uphold, and which we are sworn to uphold.

I am weary of hearing about defending democracies which are nothing but bloody, aggressive empires, which hold hundreds of millions of enslaved people under their imperial rule. We are still nursing our wounds from the last war "to save the world for democracy." We are still trying feebly to collect billions of unpaid war debts which the debtors solemnly promised to pay, but never paid; and yet they have the nerve to come over here to us now and ask us again to defend their democracies—democracies, indeed!

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not desire to get into an argument over the relative merits of various democracies, especially in connection with the christening of the Clipper, which is the subject about which we are talking.

I hope all Senators can see the Clipper. I do not think it makes much difference whether we see it when a bottle of champagne is being broken over it or later. I think it would be very educational for us to look at it and examine it minutely.

In all seriousness, I do not feel that we ought to adjourn tomorrow around 2 or 3 o'clock, with the bill still undisposed of, in order to see the Clipper unveiled, dedicated, or started on its hectic career.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Or splashed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or splashed. [Laughter.]

It is now 4 minutes to 5. Inasmuch as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] does not wish to conclude this afternoon, I shall not punish him by insisting upon it.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. However, I hope the Senator will help us dispose of the bill tomorrow. I should be perfectly willing to have the Senator insert in the Record the entire article to which he refers.

Mr. NYE. That has already been done.

Mr. President, is it the understanding that I shall be recognized tomorrow when the Senate convenes?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not knowing what was in the Senator's mind, I had spoken to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and also to the minority leader and other Senators about agreeing to a limitation of debate tomorrow, beginning at 1 o'clock. The Senator from Missouri desires to speak for about 30 minutes. The Senator from North Dakota says he has an hour left. Would it be possible today to enter into an arrangement by which, beginning at 2 o'clock tomorrow, we could limit debate to 20 minutes on the bill and on the amendments?

Mr. NYE. I should have no objection.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, personally I have no objection. I should like very much to conclude the consideration of the bill tomorrow. I do not know how my very able colleague from Minnesota feels about the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that yesterday I consulted the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and he assured me that if we did not conclude consideration of the bill today, he would agree to a limitation of debate tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. I am sure there is no objection from that source.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that I have no disposition on earth unduly to delay the consideration of the bill. I have some observations which I desire to submit. I am not certain how long it will take me to do it, because I do not know how much interruption there will be. I have waited until a late stage of the debate because, in addition to the observations which I wish to make on the subject under discussion, I wish to address myself to the first committee amendment, namely, that providing an increase in the authorization of planes from 5,500 to 6,000. In that connection I wish to discuss also a limitation which I desire to suggest on the amount of the dollar authorization.

As I have said and as I am sure the Senator knows, I have no desire on earth to delay consideration of the bill. However, in view of the fact that another Senator has the floor, I am not willing to tie myself down to one speech of 20 minutes' duration after 2 o'clock, because I do not know when I shall be recognized.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the situation. I have no desire to cut off the Senator or to shorten the time he wants to occupy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly have no desire to use more time than is necessary.

Mr. BARKLEY. At the same time, I think debate on this bill has been pretty liberal. There has been no attempt to restrict it. Unless we can enter into an agreement about limitation we cannot finish the bill tomorrow, which will mean that it will go over until next week.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly am not willing to tie myself down to one speech of 20 minutes after 2 o'clock, because I do not know whether or not I shall have a chance to be recognized before 2 o'clock; and I say that while my remarks may not take more than 30 minutes, they may take an hour.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well; I shall not make the proposal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I assure the Senator from Kentucky that I have no desire to consume very much time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senate agree that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], he to be recognized following the Senator from North Dakota, we shall then impose a limitation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly shall have no objection to that. I may say to the Senator from Kentucky that I have no desire to take a great deal of time, but in view of the fact that I may be interrupted I do not desire to tie myself down in advance.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think we had better let the matter go over until tomorrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well. I shall not press the matter now, but I shall renew the proposal in the morning.

I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). The clerk will state the nomination on the calendar.

POSTMASTER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Levi G. Bassett to be postmaster at Louin, Miss.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That concludes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, March 3, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate March 2 (legislative day of February 27), 1939

POSTMASTER

MISSISSIPPI

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend James A. Fitzpatrick, Order of Preachers, Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Omnipotent and merciful God who has vouchsafed to make known the truths and the principles which alone afford the proper perspective to the lives of individuals and of nations, and which alone exercise that directive influence which restrains greed, condemns lawlessness, and exalts righteousness, look with favor upon the Members of this legislative body whom Thou hast raised to the dignity of being co-operators with Thee in the establishment and extension of Thy kingdom of justice and of love among men.

We are not unmindful of Thy manifold benefactions in our regard. Thou hast placed at our disposal an abundance of natural resources; Thou hast caused us to be born to live under a form of government which recognizes the sacredness of human personality, safeguards the inalienable rights of individuals and of families, and guarantees intellectual and religious freedom.

At this time when contrary ideologies are prevailing in other parts of the world and by infiltration are endangering our own, we beseech Thee graciously grant to all those to whom the destiny of this country is entrusted the prudence and the courage necessary to resist these hostile influences so that we may continue to be a people pleasing and acceptable to Thee.

Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of March 1 on the new reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein a statement I made before the Ways and Means Committee on the subject of social security.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE CHICAGO MAYORALTY ELECTION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from the political battle front in the great city of Chicago and I bring greetings to my colleagues on both sides of the House.

Last Tuesday we held our city primary for the purpose of nominating candidates for mayor, candidates for city clerk and city treasurer, and electing 50 councilmen. A heated campaign was waged by both Republicans and Democrats. The New Deal was the most prominent issue and was attacked viciously by the Republican candidates and by the daily press, which is 90 percent Republican. Mayor Kelly, the successful Democratic contestant, defended the New Deal in all of his speeches and took pride in the fact that he has been a new dealer throughout his administration. With the New Deal as the principal issue it is very interesting to note the results as follows:

The total vote cast in our primary last Tuesday was 1,224,290.

Total Democratic vote cast for mayor, 942,977.

Total Republican vote cast for mayor, 281,313.

The Democratic vote exceeds the Republican vote by 661,664.

In other words, the Democratic vote, as compared with the Republican vote, was more than 3 to 1.

In the colored section of Chicago the Democratic vote for mayor in the second ward was 16,225. The Republican vote for mayor was 15,057—a clear Democratic majority of 1,168. In the third ward the Democratic vote for mayor was 15,547; the Republican vote for mayor was 9,521—a clear Democratic majority in that ward of 6,026. In the two wards the total Democratic vote was 31,772, while the total Republican vote was 24,578—making a clear Democratic majority in these two wards of 7,194.

These figures are taken from the very partisan Republican newspaper, the Chicago Daily News, owned and published by Colonel Knox, candidate for Vice President on the Republican ticket in 1936.

Colonel Knox is one of the bitterest partisan Republicans to be found in any State. His paper, like most of the great metropolitan papers in the country, is engaged in an effort to make the public feel that the New Deal and our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, are being repudiated by the electorate of the country. With the great city of Chicago, speaking through its voters, saying to the country, "We not only appreciate the fact that the New Deal, through the leadership of our President and our mayor, Hon. Edward J. Kelly, has saved our Government, for which we are deeply grateful," but we say more than that; by our overwhelming vote "we say that we are unwilling to give up this program and to elect men to office who are pledged to pursue a course different from that which has been so successfully pursued by Mayor Kelly, a 100-percent new dealer."

Mayor Edward J. Kelly, an outstanding new dealer and supporter of the President and his program, has made Chicago the greatest mayor the city has had during the more than 100 years of its existence. He has been nominated by an overwhelming vote, and on the 4th of April will be reelected by an even larger vote. If there are sections of our country that are growing lukewarm toward the President and his great program through the misrepresentation of partisan Republicans and a partisan press, they should take fresh courage from the hearty approval Chicago gave the President and the New Deal in last Tuesday's election. The Democratic Party, while casting around for an outstanding statesman and new dealer to head our national ticket in 1940, would do well to consider that Democrat and leader, Mayor Edward J. Kelly. He is Presidential timber.

Mr. Speaker, the country is still Democratic. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Maine regarding the serious situation of the fishing industry and asking the Congress for a sympathetic consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on conditions in Puerto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a short article by Boake Carter on the T. V. A., which I think will be enlightening to the membership.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes; and pending that I ask the gentleman from New Jersey what suggestion he has as to time for general debate?

Mr. POWERS. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we let general debate run for the balance of the afternoon. I have one request for a half hour tomorrow. I would further suggest to the gentleman that whatever debate there may be tomorrow be confined to the bill. If this is satisfactory and if the time is to be equally divided, I think we have reached an agreement.

Mr. SNYDER. May I suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey that we say that time should not run more than an hour or an hour and a half tomorrow?

Mr. POWERS. I would not particularly object to that, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know how many requests will be made for time on the bill tomorrow. As I said, so far I have now requests for only half an hour tomorrow.

Mr. SNYDER. Then suppose we say that we will try to hold the time tomorrow to somewhere between an hour and an hour and a half.

Mr. POWERS. We will try to hold the time to an hour or an hour and a half unless we find we do not need that much time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, that is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman restate his request regarding time?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate run on today to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey and myself, and tomorrow we will fix the time before we go into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4630, the War Department appropriation bill, 1940; and pending that motion asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill continue throughout the day, the time to be equally divided and controlled by himself and the gentleman from New Jersey. Is there objection?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—I thought it was definitely understood that general debate would go through today, and it was agreed tomorrow there would be 1 hour and 30 minutes, to be equally divided between the two sides of the House?

Mr. SNYDER. It was not definitely fixed. We will take care of that tomorrow. We will try to limit debate to an hour and a half on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER]?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to call attention to the fact that this is a very important anniversary in our history, more so perhaps than many of you realize.

On the 2d day of March 1836 Americans from all States of the Union, as the Union then existed, assembled in Texas at the little town of Washington, on the Brazos, and in a rude, unfinished building declared the independence of Texas from Mexico. That declaration of independence was made effective in the victory at San Jacinto on the 21st of April 1836. By reason of the boundary disputes that subsequently arose, the War with Mexico followed. As a result of this war more territory was added to the United States than was acquired in the Louisiana Purchase. So you see this history for which Americans were responsible has had a most important influence upon the growth and development of our whole country.

In the brief time allotted me I cannot call your attention to the many stirring episodes which are your heritage as Americans as well as mine as a Texan and an American, but I do want to commend to you a study of this history. There are many books which tell the story.

I wonder if I may call especially to your attention the letter that was written by William Barrett Travis from the Alamo. It is enough to make our blood tingle with pride as it courses through our veins. This letter is still preserved in the State capitol at Austin, Tex. It is addressed to all Americans in the world. There were just a few more than 180 Americans in the Alamo, surrounded by hosts of Mexican soldiers, and while there was still time to get a messenger out of the walls, Travis dispatched this letter:

Fellow citizens and compatriots, I am besieged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Anna. I have sustained a continued bombardment for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion, otherwise the garrison is to be put to the sword if the fort is taken. I have answered the summons with a cannon shot and our flag still waves proudly from the walls. I shall never surrender or retreat.

Then I call on you in the name of liberty, of patriotism, and everything dear to the American character to come to our aid with all dispatch. The enemy is receiving reinforcements daily, which will, no doubt, increase to three or four thousand in 4 or 5 days. Though this call may be neglected, I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible and to die like a soldier who never forgets what is due to his own honor and that of his country. Victory or death!

In attestation of the sincerity of those words everyone within the Alamo—many of them coming from States which you gentlemen represent—sacrificed his life. So it has been said very appropriately, "Thermopylae had her messenger of defeat, the Alamo had none."

This morning I call attention to this anniversary because it is peculiarly American. It is your history and your heritage. For instance, the first provisional President of the Republic of Texas hailed from New Jersey. The last President of the Republic of Texas came from Massachusetts.

Read this history and it will make you prouder still that you boast the name of American. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to bring to the attention of the Committee what I consider to be the salient matters in the military appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1940, which I reported to the House on yesterday by direction of the Committee on Appropriations.

We have heard much about national defense in recent months. It has been on the front pages of the newspapers. It has been discussed pro and con over the radio and at public gatherings. Quite recently it has been discussed at length in this Chamber in consequence of the President's national defense message of January 12 last.

It seems to me all of you should be quite satiated with the subject, so I shall try to be brief.

I think it will be a surprise to most of you to learn that the regular Budget, in the way of new availability, proposes approximately $24,000,000 less than the new availability provided in the military appropriation act for the current fiscal year.

We carried in the current appropriation act $34,603,394 of contractual authority, and now we are called upon to pay the piper. It is that contractual authority which makes the pending Budget larger.

Bear in mind, I am referring to the regular Budget.

I call your attention to the lesser availability particularly to stress the fact that the Budget was not influenced by considerations called to the attention of the House by the President in his message of January 12, 1939, which was responsible for the two legislative measures recently passed by the House, one out of the Military Affairs Committee and the other out of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and which was responsible, also, for the supplemental estimate considered by your subcommittee in connection with the present bill, to which I shall later refer.

Of course, when I say that this bill proposes less new availability than its predecessor, I do not mean to belittle its size, because, as all of you know, the current appropriation act is the largest passed since the Budget and Accounting Act of 1922 became law.

We had an unusual bill last year for two reasons: First, after the submission of the Budget, the President, as he has done this year, sent to us a message advising that we should take cognizance of increasing armaments of other nations, which he later followed with supplemental estimates totaling $16,880,000. The House granted that additional amount and later the Senate, without Budget support, added to the bill over $42,000,000. We compromised on $16,000,000. We got the Budget to send down a supplemental estimate of $6,000,000, and the other $10,000,000 we gave in the way of contractual authority. So for implementation, the current act made available around $32,000,000 more than contemplated by the original Budget.

The current appropriation act marks the first substantial step since armies have turned to mechanization and motorization toward modernly implementing our land-defense forces.

Something like $37,000,000 was allowed for that purpose, and the pending bill includes amounts approximately totaling that figure. Prior to the present year we were going forward at a rate around seven or eight million dollars.

Getting down to details, the regular Budget calls for a total of $470,305,868. A supplemental estimate since has been received of $50,000,000 for airplanes, accompanied by a recommendation that it be made immediately available. The two amounts made the total of the estimates we considered $520,305,868. We have reduced that amount by $941,944, and deferred until later the appropriation of $19,505,988, giving contractual authority instead for the present. That makes a facial reduction of $20,447,932. We only can claim credit, however, to the former figure, that is, $941,944.

If you will turn to the table on page 3 of our report on the bill you will see at a glance what we have done to accomplish that result. I shall begin with the first item and comment upon the several changes.

As of September 30, last, there were 2,446 employees in the War Department here in Washington. To give each one of those employees one salary step up would cost $181,840. The amount of a step up depends upon classification and grade within classification. The lowest is $60 per year. Hundreds of these employees have worked for years without any advancement; without any reward of any kind, no matter how much deserved.

The Budget allows $33,960 to give advancements to 446 employees with no restriction or salary limit as to employment of the money. The committee has added $31,035 to the Budget figure, and that addition represents what incumbents of positions would earn if all of them drew their full salaries throughout the year. We are giving back the savings estimated to accrue from leave without pay, vacancies, furloughs, and so forth, to give promotions to those receiving $1,800 or less. In no case would the advancement exceed $60 per year. That rule is made to apply to the Budget allowance also. The two amounts would permit of the advancement of about 1,083 employees whose pay ranges from $600 to $1,800 per annum. Of the 2,446 employees, more than 1,400 of them receive $1,800 or less.

The next item is a small one. The index catalog of the Army Medical Library is in arrears. The Budget refused to allow two additional clerks for bringing the catalog up to date, and we are putting the money in. This is the most complete and valuable medical library in the world.

Under "Pay of the Army" you will see two reductions. The first should be familiar. For a number of years we have limited the number of medical officers in a flight pay status to five. Each year we meet with a request to raise the number. We have been turning it down and dear old Senator Copeland would put it back, and although a doctor we were successful in getting him to recede.

The second reduction under "Pay of the Army" relates to Thomason Act officers. We provided for training 650 this year. The law provides that 10 percent of those completing the year's course shall be commissioned in the Regular Army. The Budget is based on 65. The actual number on January 1, 1939, was 622. We, therefore, have figured on not more than 63 being commissioned. We probably would have been safe in figuring on a lesser number.

The next item and the one just below it in the increase column I shall refer to together. Both relate to field appropriations devoted almost exclusively to personal services. Like the Department in Washington, about which I spoke a moment ago, there is no chance for advancement for the three-thousand-two-hundred-and-odd employees which these appropriations cover, because the Budget lops off anticipated savings resulting from leave without pay, vacancies, and so forth. We are proposing restoration of Budget cuts of such estimated accruals in order that some of these people who work on and on without any pay change, however much merited, may get some slight recognition for giving their best efforts to their employer, the Government.

That brings us to the two reductions proposed under "Subsistence." The ration cost has not gone above 43.81 cents so far this year, or, at least, upon the basis of cost figures thus far available. Therefore, instead of 45 cents, as estimated by the Budget, we are allowing 44 cents. For the same reason, we are refusing to allow an increase of $500,000 asked to increase the capital of the provisions fund, now $5,500,000. We based the current appropriation upon a ration cost of 45 cents. If the price continues throughout the year below 44 cents or even slightly above that level, the saving can be employed in the purchase of reserve stocks to the value of $500,000 or more.

Next is a reduction of $1,500,000 we are proposing under "Military posts." The Budget includes $6,756,378 under this head, which is itemized on page 7 of the report. Included in the amount for Albrook Field, there shown, is a $1,500,000 project for building a depot and warehouses at Albrook Field, which is on the Pacific side of the Canal Zone. We now have a depot and warehouses at France Field, on the Atlantic side of the Canal. The information the committee had was not sufficiently convincing to warrant us recommending the Albrook Field project, and we have called upon the Department for further data. What our final recommendation will be I am sure I do not know until that information is at hand. It may be that we should have a member of the subcommittee visit the Canal Zone before coming to a conclusion.

Under "Barracks and quarters" you will observe we are proposing an increase of $200,000. That is only a drop in the bucket. We could spend many times that amount, plus what is in the Budget, for caring for buildings and other improvements at military posts and still be way under plant upkeep outlays of commercial establishments.

That brings us to the Air Corps, and I want you to get this picture straight. Up to this year we have been working toward possessing ourselves with 2,320 airplanes. The Army has not advocated a larger number, and the planes we provided for in the current appropriation act—476—were supposed to provide us with that number by July 1, 1940, which meant that planes asked for in this Budget and subsequent Budgets would be in the nature of replacements. The pending Budget evidently was built with that idea in mind. It includes provision for the procurement of 219 airplanes, 178 for the Regular Army, 19 for the National Guard, and 22 for the Organized Reserves. That is strictly a replacing or balancing program within the total of 2,320 airplanes.

Then comes the President's message of January 12, 1939. Let me read from that message what he says about aviation:

In the case of the Army, information from other nations leads us to believe that there must be a complete revision of our estimates for aircraft. The Baker Board report of a few years ago is completely out of date. No responsible officer advocates building our air forces up to the total either of planes on hand or of productive capacity equal to the forces of certain other nations. We are thinking in the terms of necessary defenses and the conclusion is inevitable that our existing forces are so utterly inadequate that they must be immediately strengthened.

It is proposed that $300,000,000 be appropriated for the purchase of several types of airplanes for the Army. This should provide a minimum increase of 3,000 planes, but it is hoped that orders placed on such a large scale will materially reduce the unit cost and actually provide many more planes.

Military aviation is increasing today at an unprecedented and alarming rate. Increased range, increased speed, increased capacity of airplanes abroad have changed our requirements for defensive aviation. The additional planes recommended will considerably strengthen the air defenses of the Continental United States, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Canal Zone. If an appropriation bill can be quickly enacted, I suggest that $50,000,000 of the $300,000,000 for airplanes be made immediately available in order to correct the present lag in aircraft production due to idle plants.

Subsequently, on January 26, last, the President submitted a supplemental estimate of $50,000,000 with the recommendation for immediate availability, for the procurement of 565 airplanes, all over and above the 2,320 program. Our information is that those planes are to be ordered of different manufacturers with a view to gearing up their production in order that they may be able rapidly to produce other planes to be asked for in further supplemental estimates. As to what we shall be asked to provide for in later supplemental estimates, I have no information beyond that contained in the President's message, from which I have just read. Undoubtedly, in addition to the $50,000,000, we shall be asked to make further funds available. Right now amounts and numbers must be entirely conjectural.

While we have been working toward the 2,320 airplane objective—the so-called Baker Board quota—authority exists for the Army to have 4,120 serviceable airplanes. We heretofore have provided for the entire number of 2,320. The pending Budget, as I have stated, provides for replacements or balancing the program within that number. Therefore, the 565 may be said to be in excess of the Baker Board quota and the first increment toward the 4,120 maximum presently authorized. If that be true, then without waiting for the enactment of the legislation we recently passed raising the authorized number to 5,500, the President is free to submit estimates right now for 1,235 additional planes, that is, the difference between 2,320 plus 565 and 4,120. However, as I said, what we shall be asked to do is wholly conjectural, and my thought is that we should cross that bridge when we come to it.

Getting back to our action, we have approved the supplemental estimate of $50,000,000 and are recommending immediate availability, but are proposing the substitution of $19,505,988 of contractual authority for a like amount of direct appropriation, because we are not convinced that all of the 565 airplanes will be delivered before July 1, 1940. I ask you to look at the last paragraph on page 8 of the report. Let me read it:

On December 31 last there were 557 airplanes on order, some under funds or contractual authority which became available as far back as July 1, 1936. On the same date orders had not been placed for 348 airplanes for which the Congress heretofore had made provision. Add to these 219 in the regular Budget for 1940 and 565 in the supplemental estimate, and the total becomes 1,690 for delivery during the 18-month period December 31, 1938, to June 30, 1940. Past performance suggests that to be an exceedingly ambitious program.

It seems to me you must agree with us that past performance, even though substantially bettered, does not warrant the conviction, or scarcely the hope, that deliveries of 1,690 airplanes will have been effected before the next fiscal year shall have come to a close. As we say in the report, if our guess should prove wrong, there will be time to right it early in the next session. Frankly, I hope we are wrong. I am sure all of you join me in the hope for a substantial improvement in production output.

As to the number of airplanes we should have now or in the near future, I am sure I do not care to express an opinion. The House the other day determined upon a maximum of 5,500. By providing these 565 planes, presumably to be in addition to the Baker Board objective of 2,320 serviceable airplanes, we are not necessarily committing ourselves to any expansion at all. The 565 planes may fit into the 2,320 program as replacements, or be the entire expansion thereof for the present, or may be the first increment toward an expansion ranging from 2,320 to 5,500 airplanes. The whole matter rests upon what you and the House may do in consequence of any recommendations which later may be presented.

The next money change we propose is under ordnance. We suggest a reduction of $332,480. Frankly, I imagine the Department will oppose this reduction. Our principal field weapon today is the old French 75-millimeter gun. There is no disputing the fact that it is a very splendid gun. The Army has been engaged in modernizing a limited number of these pieces to give mechanical traverse, greater range, and improved mobility by replacing the wooden wheels with wheels equipped with rubber tires, permitting of towage at high speed. The cost of modernization per gun has run well in excess of $8,000.

You will not find it in the hearings, but the Chief of Field Artillery told us that certain foreign armies have discarded the 75-millimeter gun for a 105-millimeter gun, which has a much greater range and throws a 35- instead of a 15-pound missile. Of course, that can mean but one thing. Other armies are going to do likewise. We have a 105-millimeter gun in the development stage. Now, our thought is that if we are going to adopt the larger gun, should we not stop right now spending such large sums on modernizing the old French 75's? We are proposing to limit modernization to 4 instead of the 44 contemplated by the estimate, and those 4 will be sent to West Point for instructional purposes.

Next, you will find two items of increase under Chemical Warfare. As to the one of $15,000, the Budget persists in cutting the research staff. They tried it last year and we turned thumbs down, and now they are trying it on a smaller scale for 1940, and we are again refusing to go along.

The second item, of $26,000, relates to supplying chemical tanks for use with airplanes, an important project in the opinion of the subcommittee, for which the Budget refused to provide.

That brings us to the National Guard. As usual, representatives of the National Guard Association came before the subcommittee and expressed dissatisfaction with the Budget and urged more generous provision. They advocated additional appropriations aggregating $4,170,090. The committee has approved of additional amounts totaling $1,028,200. This sum you will find itemized on page 11 of the report, below which is set out the reasons.

You will be interested to know that we provide for the final increment of 5,000 officers and men to bring the total strength of the guard up to 210,000. We have been working toward that objective for a number of years. This increase, however, will not occur until April 1, 1940.

Under the Organized Reserves we propose two money changes. We increase the number of officers who may attend command and service schools from 214 to 300, occasioning an addition of $94,600, and we raise the number of Thomason Act trainees from 500 to 650, which accords with what we are doing this year. You will recall that last year the House raised the number from 500 to 650. The law permits 1,000 per year. The extra 150 adds to the bill $282,757.

The bill provides for 14-day active-duty training for 30,000 Reserve officers. That corresponds with the current year.

The final change relates to citizens' military training camps. This year we gave $2,275,000 with the idea of training 35,000 boys. Actually, training has been given to 35,831. The Budget proposes an appropriation of $1,974,300 for 1940, which would mean reducing the number of trainees to around 30,000. The committee has restored the amount to the current year level. The interest in this item is very widespread. It is a very worthy project, as you all know, and does a tremendous amount of good. It means more than mere military training. It is a builder of a spirit of Americanism, of patriotism, of immeasurable value to the security of the Nation.

I think I have covered the field rather thoroughly. I may add that there is no new construction money in the bill for posts within the United States. The Army got a very big slice of P. W. A. money this year. Possibly it is expected to get more from that quarter later. That depends upon what we shall do later with such relief program as may be sent down.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should say that unquestionably we shall be asked in the very near future to add substantially to the appropriation carried in this bill. A considerable additional amount for aviation will be asked, and very sizable amounts will be asked to provide "critical items" of equipment which would be needed in an emergency, such as antiaircraft artillery, semiautomatic rifles, antitank guns, tanks, light and heavy artillery, ammunition, and gas masks; also, for educational orders.

We should reserve our judgment upon such matters until they actually are in hand. I believe if you will read our hearings and the hearings recently conducted by the Committee on Military Affairs, you will be prepared to give more intelligent consideration to those supplemental proposals when they come along.

I wish most sincerely, my colleagues, and I am sure all of you join me, that instead of receiving supplemental estimates we might receive a communication telling us that changed world conditions render it unnecessary to provide for expenditures for national defense even on the scale contemplated by the regular Budget. I regret as much as any of you this demand to put such vast sums into engines of human destruction, whether ever actually used for that purpose or not. I am persuaded to the view that adequate preparation is the best assurance that they will not. [Applause.]

I recall vividly that when I studied ancient history I thought the Spartans, Athenians, the Huns, and the Vandals were terrible, cruel people in warfare. I thought they were not civilized when they seized their swords and strapped on their armor plate and went out to slaughter their opponents on the field of battle. My teachers and my fellow classmates classified those countries and nations as barbarians and uncivilized.

But how about many of our so-called civilized nations today? What constitutes a civilized nation today? Can we classify nations whose leaders go mad with greed and power for possession to the extent of deliberately killing hundreds of thousands of innocent and defenseless men, women, and children with bursting bombs and explosives as civilized nations?

We ask ourselves as a people what must we do in order that we as a Nation may not become a prey and be devoured and destroyed as a people and a Nation by such greed.

I think that fully 98 percent of our population has come to the conclusion that the surest way of assuring the United States of continuous peace is for us to install adequate national-defense installations on our mainland and in our possessions—ample seacoast defense, ample antiaircraft equipment, tanks, adequate guns, and munitions of all kinds—and, above all, thousands of modern airplanes, pursuit, attack, and bombers, and whatever other types are needed. If 5,500 are not enough, make it 10,500. Any number that will give us assurance that our peace and well-being cannot be disturbed by any foreign power.

Yes, my friends, it is far cheaper for us to spend $10,000,000,000 in adequate national-defense installations than to go to war for 10 days. When we stop to think that by the time the last World War veteran will have been laid to rest that the World War will have cost this Nation $100,000,000,000 in cold money alone, to say nothing of the loss of lives of tens of thousands of our boys who died on the battlefield or from wounds received on the battlefield.

We take out insurance on our homes, automobiles, our own lives, and the lives of our loved ones in order that we may be compensated in case of accident or death. The money we spend for national-defense equipment is merely an insurance policy the Nation is carrying. The money we spend to maintain our Army and install our installations we spend for the protection of our people and our institutions, the same as the city that is protected by its fire department and its police department.

I should go farther than the President's recommendation in training young men for air service. I should suggest a 5-year program in which we should train at least 50,000 young men to be pilots, mechanics, or technicians. I should give that number an opportunity to enlist in the Army and take a course for 3 years. If at the expiration of 3 years they did not want to reenlist, they would be prepared because of their schooling and training to go out into life's school and fit into our business and industrial institutions. Since it would only cost about $42.50 per boy per month to train them for such service, and since we pay in my State $52.50 per person per month on W. P. A., it would cost the Government less in the end to prepare these 50,000 boys for life's work than it does if we keep them on W. P. A. for the same space of time and then they find themselves without training for further advancement. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman speaks of training 50,000 boys in productive work. Does the gentleman believe we should train them to be pilots and put them in the Army as is done in Europe? Does not the gentleman believe it would be better to direct our efforts to securing disarmament in the nations of the world and have peace rather than war?

Mr. SNYDER. My contention is that the only way we can go about securing disarmament among the nations is for us to build a sufficient national defense armament in this country to show the other nations they cannot do with us as Japan is doing with China, and as other nations have done, because nations are never attacked when prepared. It is only the weak nations that are attacked.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is the gentleman apprehensive other nations can do to us what Japan is doing to China?

Mr. SNYDER. No; but I should feel very much better if we had provided ourselves in former years with a better measure of defense preparation.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does not the gentleman believe American ingenuity and American production will meet any situation that may arise in the future?

Mr. SNYDER. I have great faith in our capacity to accomplish big tasks.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

UNITED STATES SUBSIDIES FOR FOREIGN MILLS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I have just introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the present program of the Department of Agriculture.

Under the guise of "benefiting the farmer," the Secretary of Agriculture, in July last, announced that the F. S. C. C.—that is the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation—in cooperation with the A. A. A., would grant from the United States Treasury subsidies on export wheat.

He dumped 25,000,000 bushels on London and Liverpool with a Government subsidy of $5,000,000—the effect of which was to break down the Liverpool wheat market, and, within a few days the price of wheat on every produce market on the globe, and eventually the farm price for every bushel of American wheat.

Moreover, this subsidy from the United States Treasury went, directly or indirectly, to British mills, cereal factories, and bakeries, who got their raw material, that is, American wheat, at a lower price than their competing American mills, cereal factories, and bakeries. These American food industries, supplying bread to every home and worker in the United States, employ over 200,000 wage earners on a yearly pay roll of over $300,000,000.

Furthermore, our breadstuffs industry is the foundation of the wheat-growing industry and, in favorable season, has paid the farmers of the North and West as high as $900,000,000 cash—the chief spot-cash reliance of the wheat-growing States.

During the first week of February 1939, the F. S. C. C. and A. A. A. dumped 2,000,000 more bushels, at a subsidy of around 35 percent—as measured in transportation costs, insurance, and handling—upon the dairy producing and exporting interests of Holland, at the ports of Amsterdam and Rotterdam. Thereby, American bran and shorts are furnished to the dairymen of Holland at lower cost than the price paid for them by the butter makers of Minnesota, the cheese makers of Wisconsin, or the milk producers of Iowa and up-State New York.

Every Member of this House well remembers that this same Holland, which is now thus subsidized from the United States Treasury, shipped into this country during the 3 years ending 1937 upward of 8,000,000 pounds of butter and 10,000,000 pounds of cheese.

So, it seems the New Deal policy is to subsidize the Netherlands, so it may undersell American dairymen in their own markets, and thereby enable the European Amsterdam to furnish European butter to "New Amsterdam" at below the American farm cost of production—and this by aid of a subsidy from the United States Treasury.

Letters which I have received during the past few days from American produce markets—wheat and dairy producers, milling and other cereal industries—agree in this verdict as to the net effect of this F. S. C. C. and A. A. A. subsidy grant to Europe and Asia since the beginning of the current fiscal year. They all agree:

First. That this wheat subsidy—and, also, it seems now, subsidy on flour—has been the outstanding cause of lowering the price of wheat on every market on the globe, and thus has reacted to cut down the farm value in every American farm granary.

Second. That it has hurt, instead of helped, the flour export trade and cereal export trade of the wheat-processing industries that employ American labor and furnish the wheat grower his principal market.

Third. That the cheap bran and shorts of this subsidized wheat is a prime cause of concern to every dairy-producing community in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have here presented in brief outline a sort of bird's-eye sketch of the theme which, if the House will permit, I should now like to discuss in sufficient detail, so that all sections of our country may know what the latest new deal in government subsidy means to us and our industrial future.

And, let me say right here, that this harmless-looking wheat subsidy hits not only grain-growing West but every American industry and all of our 50,000,000 workers and 30,000,000 homes—north and south, east and west.

WHEAT SUBSIDY RESULTS, JULY 1, 1938, TO MARCH 1, 1939

From July 1, 1938, up to February 28 of the current fiscal year, exports of American wheat to foreign mills and markets closely approximate 90,000,000 bushels.

The bulk of these wheat exports have been subsidized from the United States Treasury, or, more accurately speaking, from the Treasury deficit, pursuant to the new "two-price plan" proclaimed by Secretary Wallace at the beginning of this fiscal year.

The average subsidy per bushel announced by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation—the Bureau assigned by Mr. Wallace to administer his plan—is estimated in the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation offices, at the Department of Agriculture, as an "average 25 cents" subsidy per bushel.

In fact, the rate and amount of the subsidy vary according to the port of import and foreign competition at the given port. On January 23, 1939, the Department of Agriculture announced:

The estimated losses to the Corporation on sales of wheat, including storage charges, and indemnity on flour for export, average approximately 25 cents per bushel up to January 15.

But during the first week of the past month, February 1939, the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation dumped in the ports of Amsterdam and Rotterdam, Holland, 2,000,000 bushels of American wheat at around 61 cents per bushel.

The rate of the subsidy on this shipment may be estimated from the following items—the wheat being supposed to come from the Middle West:

Transportation by rail from Minnesota or Kansas to Galveston, around 18 cents; ocean freight from Galveston to Amsterdam, 12.7 cents; insurance, elevator charges, and sundry handling costs, 3.5 cents; or a total for transportation and handling costs of 34.2 cents. Then, add to that the price loss of around 14 cents, the difference between the 61 cents at which the wheat was furnished to Dutch mills and cereal factories and the 75 cents paid by the mills and cereal factories of Minnesota.

What was the amount of that subsidy to the mills of the Netherlands? It cannot be far from 40 cents per bushel. And for what useful purpose, except to aid the industries of the Netherlands and give cheaper bread to a foreign country than is enjoyed by the hungry in our own country?

Did it benefit the American farmer? On the other hand, the ultimate effect, because Liverpool is the price-fixing market for the world wheat trade, was to lower the price of wheat on all American markets where the wheat grower sells his crop. In furnishing foreign milling and cereal product factories with American wheat at below the American mill price the Government thereby cut down the market demand at all American primary markets. And so American prices began immediately to sag—and these American prices are the dependence of the farmer for over 80 percent of his wheat crop.

The repercussion of that Amsterdam-Rotterdam subsidized wheat shipment was immediate on all American wheat markets. Listen to the following from the New York Times dispatches of February 6, 1939:

Liverpool led the decline and closed $\frac{3}{8}$ to $2\frac{3}{8}$ cents a bushel lower.

Winnipeg futures were 1 to $1\frac{1}{8}$ cents lower. Kansas City closed $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{8}$ cents lower, and Minneapolis was off $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents from a week ago.

Chicago closed yesterday with net losses of 1 to $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents on the week.

Instead of being a benefit to the American farmer, the subsidized wheat dumped abroad hit the wheat grower in the home markets where he sells upward of 600,000,000 bushels of his crop, or 80 percent of all the wheat he grows.

One of the basic principles on which American industry has been built up during the past 80 years—until American mills and factories turn out a finished product equal in value to the combined factory product of the four leading countries of Europe, and distribute to wage earners a yearly pay roll that in normal times equals the entire factory pay roll of Europe—is this: To lay no Federal hand upon the opportunity of American industry to acquire its raw materials at a market price on terms of parity with competitors abroad.

The present policy of this subsidized wheat plan is to give the foreign competitor in food products the benefit of a subsidy which the Administrator admits, in his January 23 statement, "averages 25 cents per bushel up to January 15." In other words, the Government admits paying 25 cents per bushel, which is equivalent to a subsidy of over 35 percent in value, to build up foreign cereal industries at the expense of an American industry, which even in 1935 in flour mills alone, as shown by the Census of Manufactures for 1935, paid over $35,000,000 in wages to labor and paid over $750,000,000 for raw materials, chiefly the products of the American farm.

On December 14, 1938, after the Wallace subsidy plan had been operating in its fifth month, the Department of Agriculture gave out this announcement:

Corporation officials estimate that the differential on the recently announced sale of wheat to millers in the United Kingdom, totaling about 25,000,000 bushels, will be slightly above 20 cents a bushel.

That is to say, the United States Treasury is paying to British millers and food manufacturers a subsidy of $5,000,000 to enable British mills to shut American millers and cereal-food manufacturers from what formerly was their best export market. Is this the present policy of developing American industry? Is this the new way of feeding the "one-third of our population" that are supposed to be "undernourished"?

The pretense that it is benefiting the American farmer is exploded by the fact that wheat prices on American primary markets started on the toboggan downward from that British subsidy dump to the present month. Wheat is dropping during the very months when normally it makes its chief gains in price—from December to March. Subsidy has killed the law of supply and demand—subsidy from the United States Treasury to Europe.

The blow to our export trade in processed cereal-food products, by subsidizing British manufacturers, has cut down the farmer's wheat price in every home market—the market which is his dependence for a cash income to meet his taxes and mortgage payments.

On January 28, 1939, the Modern Miller, published in the Chicago milling district, refers to the "3 months' supply of flour milled by British mills from 25,000,000 bushels so advantageously purchased from the United States with a $5,000,000 subsidy from the United States."

Continues the Miller:

British millers added to their laurels in having the United States wheat duty removed and the discriminating duty on flour enlarged, by a purchase of subsidized F. S. C. C. wheat, with the agreement that the United States would cancel the flour indemnity (subsidy). Now, that United States, Canada, and Australian millers may appreciate the dominance of British mills, the wheat will be dumped on British bakers in the form of flour. * * * British bakers enter the picture cast in an important role. * * * We wonder if the F. S. C. C. dreamed of such a thing.

Here are three questions: First, is Secretary Wallace trying to punish the wheat-growing and wheat-processing States, which, on November 8, 1938, turned down his "A. A. A. of 1938" and elected from the wheat-producing States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Idaho, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, California, and the Dakotas—128 Republican Members out of a total of 169 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, of which a majority took the place of new dealers?

Second. (a) Is he punishing the farmers of Minnesota, and the milling and wheat-processing cities and towns of Minnesota, and the wage earners of those wheat-processing industrial centers, for electing to this House a Minnesota delegation opposed to his paternalistic subsidy grants and electing to the State capitol in St. Paul a new Republican Governor by a plurality of 291,576—the largest Republican plurality in the history of Minnesota?

(b) Is he punishing the wheat growers and the mill and elevator towns of the wheat-growing States of North and South Dakota, who send here a solid Republican delegation?

Third. (a) Is he punishing the farmers and the mill and elevator towns of Kansas—the largest wheat-growing State in the Union, or perhaps in the world—which in November 1938 put over an old-fashioned Republican landslide, a clean sweep except for one Member who may or may not approve of the Wallace subsidy to British and Dutch cereal manufacturers?

(b) Is he punishing the farming districts of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and northern New York—which, though called "eastern industrial States" by people in the West, raised last year and are now processing 75,000,000 bushels of their own wheat—because they elected to this Congress 53 Republican Members, who hold mandates protesting against all of the Wallace paternalistic claptrap, from goose-stepping the farmers to subsidizing John Bull and his tulip-growing Dutch cousins?

The case of this Amsterdam-Rotterdam subsidy raises a new economic angle affecting the dairy industry of the United States. One of the important byproducts of wheat milling is what is called the "offal"—the bran and shorts that are highly essential feed for the dairy industry. For the great dairy interests of the Netherlands this byproduct may be of greater consequence than the protein content for flour.

Note the situation: The Agricultural Yearbook, 1938, issued by Mr. Wallace, states that the Netherlands shipped into this country—by aid of a New Deal treaty not approved by the Congress or even submitted to the Congress for rejection—shipped, I repeat, into this dairy country in the fiscal year 1936-37, 2,463,000 pounds of Dutch butter in competition with the farm cooperative butter makers of Minnesota, and 5,439,000 pounds of Dutch cheese in competition with Wisconsin, to say nothing of their starch exportations, under the same treaty, into this country as stated in my remarks in this House on February 1.

In the fiscal year 1934-35, aided by a New Deal tariff treaty, the Netherlands shipped into the United States 4,796,000 pounds of Dutch butter for American consumption, which is a close approximate to the Minnesota butter shipments to New York in November 1938.

At first glance, one might judge that the dairy interests had benefited from the Wallace panacea because it has cut down the price of wheat, and thereby the cost of bran and shorts for the cows. But note: Whatever benefits the dairy cows may have received from lower-priced wheat are completely annulled by the wheat export subsidy—which gives the European dairyman his bran and shorts from even lower-priced wheat.

The butter and cheese makers of Holland are getting their bran and shorts from 61-cent American wheat, while American butter and cheese makers are getting their bran and shorts from wheat priced at 70 cents to 80 cents a bushel—a price differential of 15 percent to 30 percent.

Holland is given by the New Deal subsidy plan a differential averaging 20 percent in the essential feed costs of butter, cheese, and milk, in competition with the dairymen of the United States.

With that aid from the present Uncle Sam—a subsidy plus a tariff treaty—the Netherlands should be able to extend its dairy imports into American markets in the coming year and as long as the American people will submit to that kind of bold experiment and/or "emergency."

Note this record from the Agriculture Yearbook, 1938, page 404: During the 5 years preceding this New Deal experiment in butter, the Netherlands imported into the United States just 1 pound of butter—probably a sample roll, which may have been sent to "New Amsterdam" in the prosperous year 1929. Apparently the sample did not rank up with the gilt-edged product of the Land O'Lakes in Minnesota. For, in the 4 succeeding years, according to the Wallace yearbook, the butter imported into this country from Holland is represented by the significant symbol "0"; that is to say, a complete "goose egg" for 4 long years.

From 1929 to 1934, until the New Deal struck its gait, all the butter from the Netherlands, all the butter which the honorable countrymen of Peter Stuyvesant, the famous Dutch Governor of New Netherlands, could get into "New Amsterdam" was 1 pound and four "goose eggs."

Then the New Deal hit its gait—and in the 3 following years to 1937 the butter shipments from Holland to American ports made a total of 8,000,000 pounds of butter, not to mention 10,000,000 pounds of cheese.

Today, beginning with the first week of this month, Holland, by the aid of a subsidy of around $700,000 from the United States Treasury, plus an inviting tariff treaty and a benevolent smile, may be able to get its bran and shorts at a low-price cost, sufficient to give our present "New Netherlands" all the butter it needs from the old country, without calling upon the insurrectionist progressive dairymen of Minnesota, or even New York up-State.

Another question: Is Mr. Wallace out to purge Congress again, following the precedent set by the Senate purge in the primaries of last summer?

If the result of that purge is repeated in the political history of 1940, it is not beyond the range of possibility that the farmers of the United States, and their cousins in the towns, may seek a purge of the Cabinet—beginning with the first letter of the alphabet, which under the New Deal begins "A. A. A."

SUBSIDIZED WHEAT AND VLADIVOSTOK BUTTER

But hear this: In addition to the 2,000,000 bushels of subsidized wheat sent to Holland in aid of the imports of butter from the Netherlands, Wallace and the F. S. C. C. shipped

1,000,000 bushels to Vladivostok and sundry Siberian ports of Russia at a delivery price of around 58 cents per bushel.

Why ship wheat to Russia, the greatest grain producer in the world? Is it because Russia is a communistic state, or, as now picturesquely described "communicative" or Communist posing as democratic? Or is it because Russia is ambitious to invade the American butter market and needs our bran and shorts in the Siberian district where there are few mills?

The answer is found in the table of dairy imports in the Department of Agriculture. Here we find, though apparently hitherto unspecified and unpublished: That Russia recently has become one of the chief shippers of foreign butter into the United States—as high as 2,133,083 pounds in 12 months—equalling even New Zealand and the Netherlands, and far exceeding Argentina and Latvia, the two next countries in size of our butter imports.

In the single month of January 1937 Russia shipped to us 538,550 pounds of butter; in February 980,600, and in March 584,528 pounds—or over 2,000,000 pounds in 90 days, which seems to beat all previous records—indeed, all butter import records since reciprocity treaties and subsidized rackets began.

But Siberian Russia has a very scanty milling development, and it is a long haul from the wheat fields of European Russia to the mills on the Pacific coast of Siberia. So our accommodating Secretary of Agriculture and his F. S. C. are helping our Siberian friends by giving them American wheat subsidized at 58 cents per bushel, which gives the Russian forces on the Pacific low-cost flour, while at the same time making Siberian Russia able to ship 2,000,000 pounds of communicative butter into the United States within the brief period of 90 days.

For the farm cooperative butter makers of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Kansas and Nebraska, Iowa and Wisconsin, Illinois and Michigan, Ohio and up-State New York here is a new deal in the new statescraft of "communocracy," so-called.

Subsidized wheat at 58 cents delivered by Secretary Henry Agard Wallace in exchange for imported Siberian butter delivered by Commissar R. J. Eikha, of Moscow and Leningrad—agricultural reciprocity, aided by a subsidy from the United States Treasury deficit in aid of the new communocracy.

This New Deal is lacking, however, in one essential particular, namely, endorsement by the people of the United States.

Leaving that picture and getting back to the serious economic aspects of this plan to subsidize foreign industries, our attention is first called to the large field of American industries directly affected.

The bread-making industries, all of which are threatened by this reversal of the American industrial policy, are included in three classifications of the United States census of manufactures. First, there is the flour and other grain mill products industry, which in 1929 engaged 4,022 establishments, employing 27,000 wage earners and paying out $35,000,000 in wages and processing $868,000,000 of raw materials, chiefly the crops of the wheat growers.

Then comes the cereal-preparations industry, which in 1929 engaged 121 establishments, employing 6,488 wage earners at wages amounting to $8,876,000 and buying farm products valued at $100,000,000.

Also directly affected by the subsidy to foreign bread makers is the bread and other bakery products industry, engaging over 20,000 establishments, employing over 200,000 wage earners, and meeting a yearly pay roll of $270,000,000. Inasmuch as the raw materials of the baking industry, largely flour from the mills, does not come directly from the farm, the $700,000,000 invested by the bakeries in processed grain is not included in the total of farm purchases, although it is one of the chief foundations of farm prosperity.

The aggregate labor employment of American industries affected disadvantageously by subsidizing foreign industries exceeds 230,000, and this at a time when unemployment is one of our chief national problems.

The yearly wages paid by these cereal manufacturing industries exceed $313,000,000, which is of vital concern to every industrial town in America.

The total amount of wheat processed and bought from the farms would in normal times of prosperity, unhampered by tinkering panaceas and/or subsidies to foreign competitors, amount approximately to $900,000,000, which is somewhat less than the 5-year average, 1924–28, inclusive, under the Coolidge administration, when the father of the present Secretary held the portfolio of Agriculture.

It is safe to say that under the administration of Calvin Coolidge, with the elder Wallace at the head of the Department of Agriculture, no subsidy from the United States Treasury would ever have been paid to foreign producers to enable Europe to undermine American industries that employ over 230,000 wage earners on a yearly pay roll of over $313,000,000 a year and furnish a home market for a $900,000,000 wheat crop.

There is yet another angle of this foreign subsidy plan that directly affects even the industrial centers of the North Atlantic group of States. We have been told that one-third of our population is underfed. Then why not, in the name of common logic, utilize our bread surplus to feed our underfed instead of feeding Europe, Asia, and Africa and sending along a Santa Claus subsidy of millions of dollars to aid the British and the Dutch? [Applause.]

The practical problem which confronts you gentlemen of the industrial Northeast is this: Your chief competitor, not only in the world export trade in manufactured goods but possibly at your own ports, is Great Britain and to less extent the Netherlands. One of the chief factors in world competition is the living cost and, first of all, the food cost. When competition in manufactured products is close and made still more close by favorable tariff treaties, such as the new treaty with Great Britain, the comparative food cost may be the deciding factor in comparative production costs and thereby control of the trade.

Therefore, picture this. You will see in the market columns of your daily press that the average price of wheat, from which your wage earners and homemakers get their daily bread, has averaged around 85 cents on Atlantic Coast markets. Whereas your British, Russian, and Dutch competitors—thanks to this Government subsidy on wheat—are getting the same American wheat, and the flour and bread made from it, at 20 cents less per bushel than your local flour and cereal mills pay for it.

And if you use the Minneapolis flour brands from my home town, as many of you do, it amounts to the same thing. London and Liverpool, Amsterdam and Rotterdam, are getting their wheat at 10 cents to 15 cents per bushel below the Minneapolis wheat market. The freight on our flour from the Mississippi Valley mills to your town, added to our wheat cost, makes the flour and bread of your wage earners cost around 20 percent more than the British and Dutch cost, pursuant to this plan of Government subsidy in aid of industrial centers abroad.

So your industrial interests in the East, as our agricultural interests in the West, stand on the same foundation and always against subsidizing Europe to give British dominance over American industry. And now, turning to our friends of the Southland, the President has said that economic problem No. 1 is your section of the United States. He is profoundly concerned in your welfare. One of his deep concerns, and rightly so, is your health—how he may rescue your rural communities from undernourishment, and, particularly, from that dread disease pellagra, said to be due to an unvaried corn-and-hog diet.

Not for a moment doubting the sincere concern of the White House in your diet ration and the means of giving you a more varied menu, may I ask this practical question: Why, instead of shipping our northern bread products to Europe and Asia, with a subsidy from the United States Treasury, and aiding the dairy and poultry production of the Dutch—why, I ask, does he not consider the bread needs and the dairy product needs of problem No. 1, and make it easier for your people to vary their corn-and-hog diet by eating Minnesota bread and butter in exchange for the staple productions of the South?

And note you this: This wheat subsidy makes white bread in the South cost 25 percent to 35 percent more than in Europe, Asia, and Africa.

What both sections and all sections need above all is more liberty, more freedom from the paralyzing arm of Government—less purge and paternalism—borrowed from Hitler and Stalin—more government by the people, according to the principles of Lincoln and Jefferson. [Applause.] Above all, we need less of the subsidized nostrums which dose the people of the United States and cut down their industrial enterprises in the commercial interest of competitors abroad.

Before closing these remarks let me quote briefly from the morning paper of my home town—the Minneapolis Tribune of February 10—showing the immediate effect of this Amsterdam-Rotterdam subsidized shipment upon the wheat markets of the Middle West during the first week thereafter. In quoting from the Tribune, I am citing what likewise appeared in the market columns of substantially all dailies published in the States that constitute the country's chief bread basket.

The headline begins "Wheat drops sharply here." That was the immediate effect of the Wallace two-price plan, in supposed aid of the wheat grower.

Then follow the Minneapolis wheat receipts. I quote: "Decrease from week ago 135 cars." For the week—

Primary receipts were small. Shipments continued larger than receipts. Flour trade was moderate and disappointing.

Then appears this significant item, showing that F. S. C. C. subsidy dumping affected the entire wheat trade world—even the Antipodes. Again I quote:

Australian and Argentine offers slightly cheaper on account of North American markets.

That is to say, the depression on American primary markets for the farmer's wheat had its effect even in the Southern Hemisphere in cheapening the world market, and thereby still further damaging the market future of the farmer who was the loudly advertised subject of Wallace's solicitude.

Winnipeg May wheat closed $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents lower.

Chicago May $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents lower.

Wheat sag had its effect on other farm staples. All grains showed weaker tone, and flax dipped sharply lower in sympathy.

The Minneapolis Journal reported May wheat in Minneapolis is at $71\frac{1}{2}$ cents on February 9—as compared with $105\frac{1}{2}$ cents in the same week a year before—a drop of 34 cents per bushel, and a strange commentary for A. A. A. and subsidy which were to save the farmer from the evil effects abroad.

No. 1 heavy dark northern spring cash wheat bought by Minneapolis mills and wheat cereal manufacturers stood at $75\frac{1}{4}$ to $76\frac{1}{4}$ cents, or about 15 cents above the Government subsidy price at Amsterdam in aid of the Dutch. Minnesota and South Dakota winter wheat, not so high in protein content, was $71\frac{1}{4}$ to $72\frac{1}{4}$ —10 cents above the Amsterdam price of wheat which furnish the bran and shorts to enable the Dutch to undersell Minnesota butter in Atlantic coast markets.

The Northwestern Miller, published in Minneapolis, reported that the mills of the Northwest, based on telegraphic reports from 60 percent of all flour mills in the North Central States, showed 1,110,144 barrels as the week's grist, compared with 1,486,727 barrels in the same week 3 years before—that is to say, in 1936, after the United States Supreme Court had knocked out the first A. A. A.

From this direct evidence of the dire effect of the Wallace panaceas in damaging the cause of the American wheat grower and dairy farmers, no one who looks at the election returns of November will wonder why the wheat and cereal manufacturing districts of the North and West placed Henry Agaard Wallace on the toboggan slide.

Our industrial friends of the northeastern group of States may well also note this: That their wage earners and home makers have a food cost for bread and milk—as a result of this Government subsidy to mills abroad—ranging 20 percent to 30 percent above the basic food cost to their chief foreign competitors, the British.

British manufacturers, besides their superior merchant shipping facilities, are now able, under the Wallace subsidized wheat-export plan to beat New England and other northeastern industrial centers in having lower-cost bread for their workers—and by aid of subsidy from the United States Treasury—or Treasury deficit!

In his first book or speech on international relations, Secretary Wallace, about 5 years ago, proposed that the United States rely upon the British merchant fleet for marketing the American surplus. That plan rejected, he tried the A. A. A. That plan snowed under by farm revolt, he now tries that good old liberal plan—subsidy—and subsidy for John Bull and the Dutch and Russians.

But the most interesting item of all is this: Instead of benefiting the farmer, the subsidized wheat dumping abroad has broken down not only the foreign market, but has reacted on the American wheat market and reduced the price of wheat on every produce market in North America.

The price of the farmer's wheat in his own home market is dropping steadily, week after week, with every dumping of subsidized wheat on an uncertain world market. Were the latest Wallace plan put into song, it might well follow that old Sunday-school hymn, thus revised:

Dropping, dropping, dropping, hear the prices fall,
Every one for Henry, he will get them all!

[Laughter.]

Protests of American millers at Government action, in practically prohibiting exports of American flour, forced Wallace to amend his plan by also giving the millers a bite of subsidy pie in the shape of around 90 cents a barrel, or, in the case of exports to the Philippines, 95 cents per barrel. All that this amounts to is a hedge differential which partly equalizes competition with foreign millers. The 90 cents per barrel—there being 4.6 bushels of wheat in a barrel of flour—is equivalent to not quite 20 cents per bushel on the wheat content. Under this aid to milling, the millers have managed to export, in the form of flour, about 15 percent of the wheat furnished to foreign millers subsidized by the United States Government. And wheat cereal foods, such as Cream of Wheat, Minneapolis, get not even the subsidy bite allowed the millers. Cream of Wheat gets a "freezeout." P. S.—Maybe they forgot to advertise in Wallace's Farmer.

The same goes for Wheaties, Shredded Wheat, Puffed Wheat, Grape Nuts, a score of wheat cereal products manufactured by Kellogg Co., the National Biscuit Co., the General Foods Co., and dozens of cereal-manufacturing companies which my time does not permit cataloging. All of these wheat cereal productions, manufactured in all the wheat-growing States of the Union, are hit by this export wheat subsidy of 25 percent to 35 percent—drawn from the United States Treasury to subsidize their competitors in foreign countries.

VIOLATION OF THE DUMPING CLAUSE AND BOUNTY CLAUSE OF WORLD TARIFF ACTS—UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN

And now last, but not least, an outstanding feature of this wheat-subsidy plan is its conflict with the dumping clause and the Government bounty clause of all the tariff acts of the world—including the tariff law of the United States.

The tariff laws of most foreign nations have a clause similar to that of section 303 of the United States tariff law, to wit:

Sec. 303. Countervailing duties: Whenever any country, dependency, colony, or other political subdivision of government * * * shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the manufacture or production or export of any article * * * produced in such country * * * then upon the importation of any such article or merchandise into the United States * * * there shall be paid, in all such cases, in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this act, an additional duty equal to the net amount of such bounty or grant, however the same may be paid or bestowed.

That is to say, Government subsidized exports are under the ban of the laws of all nations as "unfair practices" in world commerce. Subsidized exports stand in the same class as a "corrupt practice" in violation of the principle of fair trade.

Moreover, the danger is enhanced when the subsidy is arbitrarily controlled and administered by a bureaucratic official, not elected by the people, or responsible either to the people for his arbitrary exercise of power over our foreign relations, or responsible to the Congress which, under article I of the Constitution, is presumed to have exclusive power over the national purse strings.

In this particular case we have a commissar of subsidy who has greater powers in our foreign commerce than any commissar in Moscow, except only Secretary-General Joseph Dugasvili Stalin himself. Our commissar dumps American wheat and reaches into the Treasury for a Government subsidy thereon, at any rate or figure he arbitrarily chooses. He fixes the foreign delivery rate at 64 cents in one harbor, at 61 cents in Amsterdam, at 58 cents in Vladivostok—and a European cable arrives while I am preparing these remarks, to the effect that a wheat cargo is en route to Europe from the Argentine that may reduce our delivery basis to 56½ cents—or little over one-half the market price of good spring wheat paid by the mills of my district 1 year ago.

No man needs to be told what the natural effect of such arbitrary executive power is upon our normal export trade in breadstuffs. In fact, it is rapidly destroying all normal commerce. The foreign importer dares not order a cargo of wheat, flour, or other cereal products, because before delivery of the cargo, a new subsidy rate may be cabled by the commissar in Washington, D. C., making the importation a loss to all legitimate interests concerned, both here and abroad, including the foreign importer, and as I have pointed out the American producer and shipper.

This arbitrary Government executive control strikes with exceptional force at the Independent Farm Cooperative Associations, whose 3,600,000 members in the elections of 1933 voted against the "Wallace panaceas" and/or "penalties." Indeed, the farm cooperatives are largely responsible for the New Deal upset last November.

In Minnesota, which gave some 290,000 majority against the Deal, we have 1,400 farm cooperative enterprises—the largest for any single State in the Union—whose membership exceeds 380,000 and whose yearly business reaches a volume of $150,000,000. In fact Minnesota leads the world in butter production.

Wisconsin has 1,086 farm cooperative enterprises having 220,000 membership and nearly $100,000,000 annual sales—making Wisconsin the source of more cheese than all other States combined.

Iowa has 960 cooperative associations, whose 280,000 members do a business of over $100,000,000 in varied dairy and grain products. The two Dakotas combined have 900 cooperative enterprises, wheat and dairy, having 175,000 members and a business volume of $60,000,000.

Including the farm cooperatives of Illinois, Kansas, Michigan, Nebraska, Ohio, New York up-State, and in all, over a score of leading farm States of the North and West, this country has over 10,000 farm cooperative enterprises whose 3,800,000 members do a yearly business of nearly $2,000,000,000, which asks no Government favors, no vote-bribing doles, and today has become the solid-ground foundation of that progressive common-sense and common honesty which the world may well recognize as democracy in America. The independent democracy of Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, that will stand for no paternalism, and for no communitarian commissars of agriculture!

In the cause of such democracy, the time has come, in my judgment, when the Congress of the United States should pause in its deliberations and call a halt on this Federal subsidy plan until by full investigation, as provided for in the resolution which I have introduced here this morning, under no veil of Federal secrecy, we know where this Federal subsidy pilot is steering the ship of state. [Applause.]

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. PACE. I must first congratulate the gentleman on his presentation of this subject. It certainly shows a depth of thought and investigation that does credit to the gentleman. While I cannot agree with all of his conclusions, I do admire the interest he displays in the welfare of American producers.

As the gentleman knows, when he talks of surpluses, he is on a subject that interests me very much on account of the enormous surplus of cotton. As I understand, the gentleman objects to foreign subsidies because he wants our own people to have the benefit of any excess commodities. If we were to release the excess commodities in this country, would not they have the same depressing effect on the price that the gentleman states has been caused by the foreign subsidies?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is a very good question, and I thank the gentleman for it. I think I can answer it, in part at least, by saying this: My suggestion would be that, instead of dumping this raw material either here or in Europe, we should run it through our own industries, our own processing plants, and give our own labor an opportunity to put these things on the European markets at these low prices, if the Government wants to subsidize it, at least as to flour; but do not give the foreign farmers a continuous chance to snipe at our farmers by providing them with the tools of the trade, and at a cut-rate basis, and then letting their produce into this country duty-free.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes in order to ask him a question.

I notice the gentleman complains because the Secretary of Agriculture, under a trade agreement, has shipped wheat abroad and subsidized the American wheat grower. This seems to be the principal complaint the gentleman makes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I did not get that last statement.

Mr. KERR. Under trade agreements the Secretary of Agriculture has subsidized the American wheat grower and we have sent wheat abroad, which the gentleman states has been sold at low prices abroad and for this he complains and attacks the Agriculture Department of this administration.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not objecting to the subsidization of the American wheat grower. What I am objecting to is the subsidization of European wheat growers, European mills, European dairy producers, and European poultry producers, who are getting the benefit of this dumping in Europe that is being paid for out of our Treasury deficit to the detriment of our own farmers, our own mills, our own dairymen, and our own industries.

Mr. KERR. Let me ask the gentleman this further question. Has the gentleman any complaint to make of the Department of Agriculture when it has bought, through the Surplus Commodity Credit Corporation, millions of dollars of his dairy products and has further made a loan of more than $30,000,000 the past year to the Dairy Products Marketing Association for the purpose of taking these surplus products of his section off of the market and standardizing the dairy products thereby?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is a great deal of question in my mind about the soundness of any of the present farm program except our farm-conservation program. I suppose in the face of their failure, they had to do something to save face with the farmers.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman complains about subsidizing the American wheat grower $25,000,000, but he does not complain when the Department of Agriculture lends the Dairy Marketing Association $30,000,000 to buy the dairy products, or when it directly buys more than $15,000,000 of your products within the last 12 months.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the present situation with reference to the agricultural people is an indication of the fallacy of most of the program which is being promoted at the present time by the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNOTSON].

SIX YEARS OF THE NEW DEAL

Mr. KNOTSON. Mr. Chairman, tomorrow will mark the end of the sixth year of the New Deal, so it may be well to take inventory.

Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt campaigned for the Presidency in 1932 holding out great hopes to the American people concerning what he would do for them in the event of his election. He assured them that he would drive from the land forever the scourge of depression. The costs of government would be reduced. Government intervention in business would be diminished. The National Government would assure every farmer all of the income that his heart could desire. All the people in need of relief were assured adequate incomes forever and a day. Trusts and monopolies would be destroyed. But at the same time he assured various groups in the community that he would provide for the restriction of production so as to increase prices, and thus costs to the consumer. By the way, he also promised to drive the money changers from the temple. If he did, he brought them to Washington.

Let us view what has happened to the finances of the National Government during the past 6 years. Time and time again during the campaign in 1932 and thereafter, Mr. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party assured the country that the Budget would be balanced; that Government expenditures would be decreased and no new taxes imposed. The Democratic platform of 1932 declared:

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

At Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932, the candidate asserted:

What used to be analogous to an old-fashioned account book, that all the family could understand, has become in Washington a maze of intricate double-entry bookkeeping which only a few highly trained technical expert accountants could possibly understand.

When he was inaugurated on March 4, 1933, Mr. Roosevelt once again assured the people:

Through this program of action we address ourselves to putting our own national house in order and making income balance outgo.

The Democratic platform of 1936 once more promised the Nation a balanced Budget:

Our retrenchment, tax, and recovery programs thus reflect our firm determination to achieve a balanced Budget. * * *

And as late as October 3, 1937, the Chief Executive assured the people:

But what has happened? The Budget has not been balanced. We have been suffering from greater deficits almost every year. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, the deficit was $1,942,000,000; in 1934 it has increased to $3,238,000,000; in 1935 it was $3,780,000,000; in 1936 it had increased by more than another billion to $4,853,000,000. In 1937 some people began to take hope, for it was only $3,256,000,000. In 1938 it was still smaller, $1,442,000,000. But do not get too optimistic, for this year the Treasury assures us that the deficit will be $4,085,000,000. And so that is the way the New Deal has provided us with a balanced Budget.

Through the campaign of 1932 the Nation was assured that Government expenditures would be greatly reduced. The Democratic platform promised a reduction of 25 percent:

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

Candidate Roosevelt was horrified at the expenditures made by Mr. Hoover. He was horrified at the innumerable bureaus operating under the Hoover administration, and yet in the last 6 years he has trebled them.

Mr. Roosevelt asserted in his famous speech at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932:

I shall approach the problem of carrying out the plain precept of our party, which is to reduce the cost of the current Federal Government operations by 25 percent.

I have sought to make two things clear: First, that we can make savings by reorganization of existing departments, by eliminating functions, by abolishing many of these innumerable boards and those commissions which, over a long period of years, have grown up as a fungus growth on American Government. These savings can properly be made to total many hundreds and thousands of dollars a year.

Let us see what has actually happened. The expenditures of the Federal Government in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, were $3,559,000,000. In 1934, the first fiscal year entirely under President Roosevelt's control, the total expenditures had risen to $6,353,000,000. The next year, 1935, they were $7,581,000,000; in 1936 they were $8,969,000,000; in 1937, $8,550,000,000; in 1938, $7,684,000,000; and in this present fiscal year that ends June 30, 1939, we are promised a total expenditure of $9,085,000,000. So this is the way the President has reduced expenditures.

In other words we are going to spend $9.85 for every minute since the dawn of the Christian era in operating the Federal Government during the present fiscal year. A fine record, but not one on which our Democratic friends will want to go to the people on in 1940.

Once Mr. Roosevelt tried to explain why the course of Government expenditures was not as he had predicted. He assured the Nation in a note written in 1938—Public Papers and Addresses, volume I, page 812—that these increases and expenditures were all due to the cost of extraordinary agencies of the Government:

The great increase in the expenditures of Government came from the new extraordinary agencies of Government created to meet the emergency and from the necessities of meeting the widespread needs of the unemployed.

And the simple historical fact remains that the regular expenses of the departments of the Government, as they existed in the summer of 1932, were reduced drastically by the Congress and the Executive in the spring of 1933.

Let us see if this is true. The total permanent expenditures of the national Government in the fiscal year 1934 were but $3,607,000,000. The next year they had increased to $4,215,000,000. In 1936 they were $5,627,000,000; in 1937, $5,473,000,000; in 1938, $5,454,000,000; and in 1939, $6,436,000,000. Thus the permanent expenditures of the Federal Government instead of being reduced 25 percent at least under Mr. Roosevelt have almost doubled.

Mr. Roosevelt continually assured the people that he would do everything to keep the cost of Government down and reduce taxes. Thus he said on September 29, 1932:

I propose to use this position of high responsibility to discuss up and down the country, in all seasons and at all times, the duty of reducing taxes * * * of getting the most public service for every dollar paid by taxation. That I pledge you, and nothing I have said in this campaign transcends in importance this covenant with the taxpayers of this country.

And in October 1932, at Pittsburgh, he once again reminded the people:

Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors because they are a burden on production and are paid through production.

But what has actually happened to the course of taxation? The total receipts of the Government of the United States in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, were $2,079,000,000; in 1934, $3,115,000,000; in 1935, $3,800,000,000; in 1936, $4,115,000,000; in 1937, $5,293,000,000; in 1938, $6,241,000,000; and in 1939 they are estimated at $5,000,000,000. And that is the way Mr. Roosevelt has reduced the taxes of the American people.

In the fall of 1932 Candidate Roosevelt pointed out to the American people the horrors of an unbalanced Budget and the dangers of loose fiscal finance. The continual increase of the national debt, he warned us, was a great danger.

For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road toward bankruptcy.

With the utmost seriousness I point out to the Congress the profound effect of this fact upon our national economy.

Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger. (Message to Congress, March 10, 1933.)

Let us have the courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits. Stop the deficits. (Radio address at Albany, July 30, 1932.)

But what has happened to the national debt? On March 4, 1933, it was $20,937,000,000. On February 25, 1939, the national debt was $39,845,000,000, thus constituting an increase of $18,908,000,000.

Mr. Roosevelt promised the American people repeatedly that he would do something to relieve unemployment, that it was a pressing problem, and that he would meet it. Thus, he said:

It is no time for delay when 11,000,000 of honest, industrious, and willing men and women are tramping the streets and roads of our country looking for work . . . and we of the Democratic Party will not wait. (Baltimore, October 25, 1932.)

In September 1936 he reassured the American people that reemployment was progressing rapidly:

Reemployment in industry is proceeding rapidly. Government spending was in large part responsible for keeping industry going and putting it in a position to make this reemployment possible.

But yet, after all these years of the New Deal, we still have 10,400,000 people unemployed.

He assured the American people that he would take care of relief in this country and that the costs of relief would continually decline. Thus, on January 3, 1934, he said:

If we maintain the course I have outlined, we can confidently look forward to cumulative beneficial forces represented by increased volume of business, more general profit, greater employment, a diminution of relief expense.

And on January 6, 1936, he promised us:

We can look forward today to a continued reduction of deficits, to increased tax receipts, and to declining expenditures for the needy unemployed.

But what has been the course of expenditures for relief? In 1934 it was $1,846,000,000; in 1935, $2,353,000,000; in 1936, $2,387,000,000; in 1937, $2,505,000,000; and in 1938, $1,983,000,000.

With all these efforts and all these promises, the total number of people in the United States on relief has not declined. In January 1933 there were 18,224,000 persons receiving relief; in December 1936 there were 18,872,000 persons on relief; and in November 1938 there were 22,437,000.

Mr. Roosevelt repeatedly assured us that we were on the road to recovery; that he would guarantee that we would never have depression; that we would continue to improve in this country:

Today, for the first time in 7 years, the banker, the storekeeper, the small factory owner, the industrialist can all sit back and enjoy the company of their own ledgers. They are in the black. That is where we want them to be; that is where our policies aim them to be; that is where we intend them to be in the future (October 14, 1936).

I am glad that prosperity is back with us again; and believe me, it is going to stay (October 22, 1936).

But let us see what has happened. One of the easiest ways to see what has happened toward recovery in this country is to compare it with what has happened in England to see whether we really have accomplished as much as he would assert. In England in 1932 the total national income was $11,759,000,000; in 1937 it was $23,672,000,000. Thus it is quite apparent the national income of Great Britain doubled from 1932 to 1937. What happened in the United States? In 1932 the national income was $46,359,000,000; in 1937 it was $64,000,000,000. Thus, while the national income of England increased by 100 percent, ours increased by only 50 percent. Did England recover prosperity by spending its way out of a depression, by deficit financing, and by inflationary moves? No. From 1932 to 1938 the British budget shows a surplus of approximately $400,000,000. What did we do? From 1932 to 1938 the Budget of the United States, instead of showing any surplus, showed a deficit, a deficit of truly astronomical proportions—$20,400,000,000!

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. If I can have a little more time.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, what I wish to ask the gentleman is this: Can he give us any information on the per capita tax of Englishmen as compared to the per capita tax of the people of the United States under our two programs?

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not got it here, but I should be glad to insert it. I have it in my office.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And will the gentleman also include with that the per capita indebtedness of Great Britain as compared to that of the United States?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I shall be happy to also insert that data.

Comparison of per capita taxation and per capita public debt, United States and the United Kingdom in 1937

	United States	United Kingdom
Per capita tax.....	$95.16	$100.81
Per capita debt.....	$29.99	1,011.25

In his Charleston speech of October 23, 1935, President Roosevelt said, in part:

We are coming back more soundly than ever before because we are planning it that way. Don't let anybody tell you differently.

He openly took whatever credit or blame due.

Here is something on performance as of March 1936. The United States ranked thirteenth among the leading nations of the world with respect to recovery. In August 1937 we were eleventh in recovery, but in February 1938 we had slipped down to seventeenth place. Perhaps someone can explain that. I have taken that little extract from a very useful publication entitled "Promise and Recovery," which is issued by the National Republican Committee, and I suggest to my Democratic friends that they send and get a copy of it.

Why has the number of persons on relief continued to stay so large? Why is it that business has not taken up the slack of unemployment? The reason is that President Roosevelt has considered as one of his major problems—as one of his major tasks—to attack business at every turn.

Despite his repeated promises to the American people of a breathing spell for business, he continued to make it the whipping board of America. For have we not during the past 6 years passed at least 37 different laws harassing, controlling, and restricting free private enterprise in this country?

He promised the American people the enforcement of the antitrust laws:

We advocate strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws, to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices, and revision thereof for the better protection of labor and the small producer and distributor. (Democratic platform, 1932.)

Mr. Roosevelt accepted that platform 100 percent.

The fundamental principles of the antitrust laws should be more adequately applied. Monopolies and private price fixing within industries must not be allowed or condoned. "No monopoly should be private" (message to Congress, February 20, 1935).

But what has been the course of the administration with regard to monopolies? From March 4, 1921, to March 4, 1933, there were an average of 13 cases a year prosecuted for violation of the antitrust laws. But under President Roosevelt the average has declined to 9 cases a year. Not only has he failed to prosecute cases under the antitrust laws, it has been the deliberate policy of this administration to enact legislation that creates more monopolies. This was the purpose of the N. R. A., the National Bituminous Coal Act, the Connally Hot Oil Act, and the Costigan Sugar Control Act.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Briefly, to my good friend.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I notice in the newspapers that over in Germany and in Italy they have practically maximum employment of the working classes, and that recently those two countries have been weaning back their nationals from other countries, while we stagger along with some twelve or fifteen million unemployed. Can the gentleman explain that?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I can explain it. There is no confidence on the part of the American people in this administration. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I think that is a very good answer, and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Roosevelt has promised the American people a reduction in labor disputes, primarily through the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. But what has happened? From 1931 to 1933 the average number of strikes per month was but 70, but from 1935 to 1938 the average per month was 262. The average number of man-days lost per month from 1931 to 1933 was 746,000, but from 1935 to 1938 it was 1,752,000. And this is the way the President has reduced labor disputes.

During the campaign in 1932 he promised to do something to relieve the railroad deficits and to protect them from bankruptcy:

While I would do everything possible to avert receiverships which now threaten us, I seek to bring the operating balance sheets of the railroads out of the red and put them into the black. In other words, I want the railroads to stand on their own feet, ultimately to reduce their debts instead of increasing them, and thereby save not only a great national investment but also the safety of employment of nearly 2,000,000 American railway workers (September 17, 1932, Salt Lake City).

On December 31, 1931, 4.99 percent of the total railroad mileage in this country was in bankruptcy. By December 31, 1933, it had increased to 16.24 percent; by December 31, 1935, it was 26.87 percent; and on June 1, 1938, 30.67 percent of the total railroad mileage of the country was in bankruptcy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides funds for all phases of military activity during the coming fiscal year. I am in favor of adequate national defense in all of its departments. To this end I have supported, and I will support, all reasonable authorizations and appropriations for the Army and Navy, upon the land, the sea, or in the air.

There are those who feel, or profess to feel, that public employees receive benefits beyond their worth. Such an attitude arises from a lack of knowledge of the facts. Federal civil employees in many instances are inadequately compensated for the service rendered and the circumstances under which they work are far from ideal. We make stern demands upon these employees. We exact of them efficient service, absolute loyalty, and devotion to duty. I am happy to say that in my long association with them, and intimate knowledge of them, I know they have not yet been found wanting in what we demand of them.

My purpose today is to speak in behalf of a particular group of Federal employees. I speak for them today, because we have before us the Military Appropriation Act of 1940, which provides the funds for their compensation. It is my earnest hope that this Congress will adopt proper legislation for the classification of all civil-service employees. Such action will eliminate many of the inequalities and injustices to which I shall refer. On the other hand, adequate funds must be provided in appropriation bills or legislative enactments will, in many cases, fail to accomplish their purpose.

I am not among those who feel there is no bottom to the Federal till. I am committed to a program of economy. Adequate compensation for honest and efficient service can never be classed as extravagance. The most efficiently operated businesses in the land have learned that such is money well spent. Further, we are diligent in providing that established wage scales shall be observed in the compensation paid to relief clients. In many cases such wages have gone to aliens, and the Congress has been reluctant to adopt any regulation to restrict the claim of aliens to these wages. The wage and hour law has been adopted and placed in effect, guaranteeing a minimum of $10 per week of 40 hours, or the equivalent of $520 per annum for unskilled or even illiterate workers. On the other hand, the Federal Government pays but $50 per month, or the equivalent of $600 per year, to educated, intelligent employees trusted with important repairs on Army aircraft, by resorting to apprentices, who are continued as such for periods of years.

Let me call your attention to the situation existing at the San Antonio air depot at Duncan Field, Tex. Understand, I make no claim that the officers of the Army in charge are solely responsible for these conditions. A large part of the blame must rest upon the Congress—a Congress which has been most generous in almost every instance, but oblivious to some of the most deserving and faithful of our regular employees.

The San Antonio Air Depot, as other air depots, is in fact a gigantic airplane repair shop and storage center. It is equipped with machines, tools, and personnel capable of thoroughly overhauling every kind of aircraft possessed by the United States Army. Its shops range from the instrument room, in which the almost human instruments of modern airplanes are rebuilt, to the shops in which the enormous B-17 bombers are overhauled. There are between 900 and 1,000 civilians employed in these shops and warehouses. They are entrusted with access to millions of dollars of Government property. Every minute detail of the latest equipment is known to them; therefore they possess our greatest military secrets. But beyond all of this, they are charged with the responsibility of so maintaining this equipment as to render it airworthy and safe for the flying personnel. Airplanes costing hundreds of thousands of dollars are placed in their hands for overhauling. You would naturally suppose that men and women entrusted with these expensive and important items of property would be the best paid and most justly treated of all Federal employees. Then you will be surprised to learn that in many cases they receive less than is paid to an unskilled W. P. A. worker. Their pay runs from $50 per month for a so-called apprentice to $200, that of a foreman.

Let us examine some cases:

There are seven employees of whom I am informed—there may be more—receiving $50 a month as apprentices, notwithstanding the fact that they have rendered faithful and efficient service for 2 or 3 years. Surely they have either progressed or they are not apt pupils and should have been released. As a matter of fact, lack of funds keeps them at their present status long after their apprenticeship has ended.

Another employee, rated as a junior aircraft mechanic, entered the Federal service in 1929 at that rating and at a salary of $1,800 per annum. Upon transferring to San Antonio his salary was reduced $360 per year to $1,440, although his rating was not changed. After 2½ years he receives the same pay. After 10 years he asks, "I started as a junior aircraft mechanic. Must I finish as one?" We must sympathize with him when, contemplating 10 years of faithful service and receiving a salary of $360 per year less than when he started, he inquires, "I wonder how much less I'll be making 10 years from now?"

Another has been with the Government continuously since 1919 as an aircraft electrician and is today receiving exactly the same salary which he received when he entered the service. Surely he should have been entitled, as many other departments recognize, to automatic increases in pay during a portion of his service.

Still another has been employed as an aircraft woodworker since 1927, has received but one increase in pay during that time, and now receives but $135 per month, notwithstanding three employees in his department receiving $170 per month have retired. No one has been placed in their positions, and he continues at $135.

Aircraft mechanics receiving salaries which it required them years to attain, find themselves working beside newcomers admitted at the same salary, but no increase for the old, faithful employees.

Another, who entered the service in 1930, has never received an increase in salary and now finds himself receiving less than when he entered the service.

One employee struggled along for 5 years on a salary of $65 per month, upon which he attempted to support himself, wife, and daughter. During all this time he was denied an increase in pay, but upon his death a new man was employed at a salary of $120 to do his work.

One of these employees, a capable, intelligent, and patriotic man, entered the service in 1920 and has remained since. He received one reduction in pay of $10 per month upon change of station and received one increase of $10 per month under the Welch bill, so he is now receiving the same pay he received when he entered the service nearly 20 years ago. He holds nine efficiency records from the days when such were issued; two of these rate him No. 1 in his group, and none place him lower than tenth. Therefore, inefficiency has not been the cause of his lack of promotion.

These instances alone show the injustice of the conditions. They are aggravated by knowledge of the fact that employees in identical positions at other depots receive much larger salaries. Recently employees have been transferred to Duncan from other depots. Their salaries do not compare to those received by Duncan employees. True, they are not too large and should not be reduced; they do show the increase necessary for Duncan employees.

As an instance, aircraft fabric workers with 10 years of service at Duncan receiving $900 per year work beside those transferred in, who receive $1,260 and $1,320 per year for the identical work. A senior commercial electrician working at Duncan for 17 years receives $1,980, while one who has been transferred there and holds the same rating receives $2,600 for identical service. The foreman of the parachute department receives $2,000, while two fabric workers on parachutes transferred to that department at Duncan from elsewhere receive $2,400 per year. Three senior packers with service ranging from 4 to 20 years work beside one from elsewhere who is rated only as a packer. The packer receives $1,620, while the senior packers receive but $1,320.

The machinist foreman at Duncan receives $2,400, senior machinist $1,860, and machinists $1,620; but a machinist transferred there receives $2,600. At Duncan a senior aircraft mechanic receives $2,000; aircraft mechanics receive $1,620; but they work beside an aircraft mechanic who receives $2,300. Duncan aircraft engine mechanic helpers receive $1,020; elsewhere they receive $1,440. Aircraft sheet metal workers' helpers receive $1,020; elsewhere they receive $1,320. These are some of the cases only, but they serve to illustrate the point.

In the face of all these facts, these men and women continue to render faithful service; they will continue to do so. You and I should not require nor permit them to do so. In the face of such conditions, it is now boasted that Duncan can turn out a "better job for less money." This has ceased to be the standard of comparison. The new vogue is an adequately paid force for all service. Surely the Federal Government can do no less.

The officers of the Army Air Corps recognize the faithful service of these employees and state it has been a trying period of years for a great many of these employees, and that their honest and faithful services have been most deserving of reward in dollars and cents rather than in words.

I hope that adequate provision will be made for these employees. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I want to stand over here where I will be directly under the Lone Star of my native State, which is outlined yonder in the ceiling of this Chamber. [Applause.]

Ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, all true Americans delight to claim as their very own the great Declaration penned by the founder of the Democratic Party and enacted by Congress on July 4, 1776. And truly every American citizen today, no matter where he resides, does rest his liberties on this fundamental charter of human and individual rights. It is, therefore, somewhat of a surprise to a number of our citizens to recall the fact that the political liberty, and in fact the entrance into the American Union, of more than one-third of our great territory of continental United States is traceable, not to the Philadelphia Declaration, but to a declaration of independence written by a group of pioneers who were not at that time even citizens of the United States. That this declaration was not directed at the misrule of King George but at the oppression of probably the first totalitarian dictator of the Western Hemisphere, Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, the self-styled Napoleon of the West. This declaration was not written in a stately hall on the banks of the mighty Delaware but in an humble log hut on the banks of the yellow stream known to the Spaniards as the "Arm of God. Here at old Washington on the Brazos," on March 2, 1836, 103 years ago today, there gathered one of the most remarkable groups of men who ever assembled on this continent. They came from Tennessee, from Missouri, from New York, and Connecticut, and from the old South. They came from Spain and Yucatan. Many of them had followed Moses Austin and, after his death, his outstanding son, Stephen F. Austin, from Missouri, down the Father of Waters and west across the Sabine to the Spanish, and later Mexican, domains. Many of these men had joined the democratic faction in Mexico and had struggled to give to that unhappy land a real freedom. Time and again they had been given assurance that their rights would be protected. Time and again they had seen their hopes of freedom crushed. At last they had marched to San Antonio de Bexar, the seat of the Mexican Government, north of the Rio Grande, and had driven its garrison back to Monclava. All winter now they had tried to carry out the provisions of the Mexican Constitution of 1824, but now General Santa Ana was besieging their fellows at the Alamo with a force of trained and well-equipped regulars, many times larger than the entire force which they could ever hope to gather. But these representatives of a free people reflected the same spirit and determination that was to be exemplified by their comrades in San Antonio 4 days later when to a man they died rather than retreat.

Thermopylae had her messenger of defeat. The Alamo had none.

Six weeks later many of these same men who wrote this document were to follow the great Sam Houston at San Jacinto in one of the decisive victories of modern times. It is not surprising, therefore, that we should find them flinging down the gauntlet to a nation then nearly as large and as populous as the United States of that time.

The Texas declaration of independence bears the unmistakable marks of the familiarity of its authors with the writing of Thomas Jefferson, but it is not, as some have supposed, but a revised copy of that document. It recites the grievances of Anglo-Saxon citizens against a Latin oppression, and for the first time in recorded history these frontiersmen wrote as one count of the indictment against the Mexican tyrant the fact that they had been denied the advantages of a free school system, and publicly proclaimed—

It is an axiom in political science that unless a people are educated and enlightened it is idle to expect the continuance of civil liberty or the capacity for self-government.

A few months later these same men and their fellows were to draft the constitution of a new republic and were to set aside great tracts of public land—their only wealth—for the support of both a system of public free schools and for a "university of the first class."

For 10 years the Lone Star shone over the Southwest. Not until after our independence had been recognized by all the world and our place as a sovereign nation had been made secure, did the Lone Star join the great American constellation. That union put in motion a train of event that brought into the American Union not only our largest State, but it brought the whole great Southwest and forced the United States to take action to acquire undisputed title to the Northwest. The annexation of the Republic of Texas immediately brought into the Union all of present-day Texas, parts of Oklahoma, Kansas, and Wyoming, all central Colorado, and all of Arizona, Utah, Nevada, and California. By forcing a settlement of the Oregon Territory issue it was likewise responsible for the inclusion of parts of Wyoming and Montana, as well as all of Idaho, Oregon, and Washington.

Thus did the men of all the older States to the East gather at Washington on the Brazos to give to the world the document that was to bring all of the newer States to the west into the great American Union of States. And today we look back through the long corridors of time and see that the history of the world was changed that cold and rainy morning when those 58 patriots met in a frontier village 103 years ago, and in the face of one of the largest military forces up until that time ever mobilized on the American Continent, raised their Lone Star banner, not only in behalf of Texas liberty but of American destiny. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I just want to compliment the gentleman on the very eloquent tribute which he has paid to the Lone Star State. Tennessee, the old Volunteer State, is very proud of the contribution she has made to the State of Texas.

Mr. POAGE. And we are proud of the acts that Tennesseans have had in our history.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. When Sam Houston heard of the death of David Crockett he was living over in Blount County, Tenn. He got on his horse and rode out of Blount County, saying to his neighbors as he rode away, "All of you who want to avenge the death of David Crockett follow me." Sam Houston was perhaps the outstanding Texan of all time.

Mr. POAGE. Sam Houston was one of the men who was at Washington on the Brazos on March 2, and he actually rode from Washington on the Brazos and made that statement that the gentleman attributes to him, and led the army of the Texas Republic to Gonzales to drive the Mexicans back.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. In addition to contributing Sam Houston to that State, we gave your State the intrepid David Crockett, who taught the Mexicans how to die. Incidentally, David Crockett represented in this Chamber the district now so ably represented by Hon. JERE COOPER, who occupies the chair today.

Mr. POAGE. That is right.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. We are also proud of the more recent contributions which we have made to your State. SAM RAYBURN, majority leader of this House [applause], was born in the district which I have the honor of represent.

HATTON SUMNERS, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is also a Tennessean. [Applause.] The father of Representative LUTHER JOHNSON of Texas was formerly a Tennessean and resided in the town of London in my congressional district. [Applause.]

Also Mr. THOMASON, of the State of Texas, was born in Rutherford County, Tenn. [Applause.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. KERR (addressing his question to Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee). And does not my good friend from Tennessee think that, had all these fine gentlemen remained in Tennessee, that the chances are that none of them would have been prosecuted? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I am sure if they will return to Tennessee they will not be prosecuted because the statutes of limitation has run against them.

Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Furthermore, I do not know that JACK GARNER was born in Tennessee, but I know his ancestors came from Tennessee. [Applause.] They came from Grainger County, and they were of sturdy stock as reflected in the character of "Cactus Jack."

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Does the gentleman realize that Jesse James and Frank James came from Tennessee to my State? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Well, the James boys did not enter upon a career of crime without some provocation.

Mr. POAGE. And they were residents of Missouri, not Texas, when they became outlaws.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to congratulate the gentleman on the statement which he has made here today. It is my good fortune to be the grandson of the last surviving signer of the Texas declaration of independence. [Applause.]

Mr. POAGE. It is the good fortune of Texas that the gentleman was born in our great State and we regret that he should have moved away and joined the Republicans.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thank the gentleman. I remember my grandfather very distinctly, and it was my opportunity to spend a great deal of time around his knee when I was a child.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. According to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], Tennessee is a good State to be from. [Laughter.]

Mr. POAGE. If you get away from it soon enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I wish to say that Texas can have the proud claim of having been the mother of much of the West. All of the long-horned cattle that came into Arizona and that part of the West came out of Texas. But along with those came the cowboy, and along with him came the seeds of civilization which we have throughout the Rocky Mountain region. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. Do they raise any Republicans down there in Texas? [Laughter.]

Mr. POAGE. They seem to migrate and go to Michigan when we do raise them there. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Does the gentleman realize that the tough corned beef which we got in France came from those tough Texas steers which the gentleman just mentioned?

Mr. POAGE. It was a long walk from Texas to France. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Speaking of the question raised by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL], let me remind him and others that had they lived very long close to the Mexican border, having in mind the Mexican products that might come into this country, they would get some knowledge of Republican protection.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, as has been said by my colleague from Minnesota, with whom I have had the pleasure of serving in this House for a number of years, 6 years ago Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States. I would add that 6 days ago Arthur M. Hyde, Secretary of Agriculture under Herbert Hoover, in a characteristic fault-finding speech delivered in Missouri, said, "For all this Franklin D. Roosevelt is responsible."

Obviously Mr. Hyde, in asserting that "for all this Franklin D. Roosevelt is responsible," did not have in mind present livestock and grain prices as compared with prices at the end of the Hoover-Hyde administration. His object was not to credit but to criticize.

I want us, then, in all fairness, to consider a few figures. In fact, the date selected by this modern Missouri Jeremiah suggests comparisons. So let us see. Last week when Mr. Hyde spoke cattle in Chicago sold at $13.75, hogs at $8.60, and sheep at $9 per hundredweight.

Six years ago this week, when, almost by unanimous consent, Herbert Hoover ceased to be President and Arthur M. Hyde ceased to be Secretary of Agriculture, beef steers were quoted at $3.25 to $6.50 per hundredweight; hogs, $3.70 top, with lightweights at $2.50 to $3.15 per hundredweight. Confirming, I quote from the Kansas City Times of October 10, 1932:

Everything that Kansas produces (and the same was true of other States) is selling at heart-breaking prices if there is any market for it. Wheat around 30 cents a bushel, corn at from 15 to 20 cents, oats at from 10 to 12 cents, cattle at 5 to 7 cents a pound, and hogs at 3 to 4 cents.

On December 14 of the year referred to, the Associated Press, under a Kansas City date line, said:

The hog market here establishes a new low level today for many years as a result of a further decline of 5 to 10 cents, which carried the best offering to $2.80 a hundredweight.

And here are some United States Department of Agriculture figures as of September 29, 1932: Hogs, $3.78, sheep, $2.17, beef cattle, $4.31 per hundredweight, and wool 9.1 cents per pound.

Still speaking of 1932 farm prices, I have here a cartoon from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of October 20, 1932. It pictures a farmer starting to town with farm produce. There are three big, sideboard high wagonloads of corn. On top of one load is a coop of chickens, ducks, and geese, and on another a can of milk. Following behind the wagons are cattle and hogs for market. In his hand the farmer carries his shopping list: "One spool thread, one pair shoe laces, and a lead pencil." As the husband starts away from the barnyard the wife calls to him, "Oh, Henry! We need a new dishpan." He answers back, "We'll have to wait for next year's crop to get the dishpan. Got about all on the list now we can buy with this one." That cartoon, an exaggeration, of course, graphically calls attention to farm conditions when Mr. Hyde was Secretary of Agriculture; when a team of good Missouri mules could not pull enough corn to pay for the harness that was on them; when the price of wool went so low that the clip from a flock of sheep was needed to pay for a suit of clothes; and when a pound of live hog would not buy a postage stamp.

I have referred to the fact that this week marks the sixth anniversary of the Roosevelt administration. We are approaching another anniversary. June 15, 1939, will be the tenth anniversary of the Hoover Farm Board, under which agriculture, as a whole, suffered as never before. Although a member of the Agricultural Committee, I was one of 35 Members of the House to vote against the Farm Marketing Act, under which the Hoover Farm Board was authorized. Under that Board, and with Arthur M. Hyde as Secretary of Agriculture in the United States, agriculture lived, but barely lived, through its darkest days. While prices were ruinously low, extravagant salaries were paid. For instance, to have paid the annual salaries of two Farm Board officials would have required 25 trainloads of corn, 50 cars to the train and 1,000 bushels to the car. Hundreds of millions of dollars were spent but with no direct benefits to farmers. The whole history is one of colossal failure.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I take it from the figures reported by the gentleman that the ex-Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde, is better in criticism than he was in construction.

Mr. NELSON. That is very characteristic of the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Is this the same Arthur Hyde who was Governor of our State and later Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. NELSON. I regret to say that this is true.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Was not his main contribution to the farmer that famous book put out by the Republican National Committee on the love life of the bullfrog?

Mr. NELSON. I cannot say as to that, but I do recall that in one speech made in Kansas City, Mr. Hyde, instead of offering a program of relief, is quoted as saying: "Depression, hell! It's a state of mind."

In his speech of last week, as indicated by press reports, the one-time Hoover Secretary of Agriculture touched but lightly upon farm conditions. It was a subject to be avoided. Comparisons as between farm prices and benefits in the Hoover-Hyde years and under the Roosevelt-Wallace program would not only have been odious, but awful. If we add to present market prices for grain the payments which growers participating in the soil-conservation program are now receiving, the spread between prices then and now will be much greater. In fact, in some cases Government payments are now about the same as prices were in the Hoover-Hyde low years.

So, while the farm problem has not been solved—and this I freely concede—it is clear to every fair-minded man that great progress has been made. "For all this," let it be said, "Franklin D. Roosevelt is responsible."

When Secretary Hyde was a member of the Cabinet he found much fault with those who criticized President Hoover. He said:

They are specialists in vilification, misinstruction, and misrepresentation, and slander. They have falsely interpreted every act of the President.

If abuse was to be condemned then, surely it is no less in order now. Rather do I believe that it will be much to the good of all concerned if, instead of carping criticism, credit is given where credit is due.

Mistakes have been made during the 6 years since Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States. The program has been in human hands. The historian of the future, though, will write that never before was such a broad humanitarian program carried forward so unselfishly and so successfully. As the American people, regardless of politics, concede this, greater good will result to all concerned. Be it said to the credit of many individuals and to a part of the press that there is evidenced a finer spirit of fairness. As an example, I quote in part from an editorial in the Kansas City Times of February 27:

MORE MEN AT WORK

It's a safe guess that a news article in the Star yesterday morning amazed most readers. It was the report that 16,000 more persons are employed in Greater Kansas City this month than were employed in the same month 3 years ago.

A gain of 14 percent in private industry in spite of 3 years that included drought and a Nation-wide depression!

We have heard so much gloomy conversation in recent years that some persons have got into a defeatist mood. They have seen no hope. They have talked despairingly about the future. They have shown all the symptoms of being licked.

It is time to forget the gloom talk. Gloom can only paralyze action. Its time to take advantage of the momentum the employment figures reveal. Its time to unite and push ahead, with every-one doing his share.

Mr. Chairman and my fellow Members, let us, then, at this sixth anniversary say, "For all the good that has come we are thankful, and for a full share of this Franklin D. Roosevelt is responsible." [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON].

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, in the United States the only anthracite coal of any commercial importance lies in four major fields in eastern Pennsylvania, within an area of only 3,300 square miles—less than 500 square miles of which are underlain by workable coal beds. The present reserves of anthracite coal are estimated at 16,500,000,000 tons, which is about three-fourths of the original reserve.

The northern coal field, commonly known as the Wyoming region, covers the counties of Luzerne and Lackawanna, with Wilkes-Barre and Scranton as the principal centers, and with many mining towns of varying population in the region.

The eastern middle coal field, commonly known as the Lehigh region, covers Carbon County, with Hazleton as the principal center, and the northeastern part of Schuylkill County, which is part of the Thirteenth Pennsylvania District, which I have the honor to represent.

The western middle coal field covers Schuylkill and Northumberland Counties, and the southern coal field covers Schuylkill and Dauphin Counties.

All of the large and extended deposits of anthracite coal in the western middle field, with mining centers of Shamokin, Mount Carmel, Centralia, Ashland, Girardville, Frackville, Gilberton, Mahanoy Plane, Shenandoah, and Mahanoy City. The major portion of the deposits in the southern coal field have mining centers of Pottsville, Minersville, Tremont, and Tamaqua, and all these are in the Thirteenth Pennsylvania District.

CONSERVE NATIONAL RESOURCES

With the administration and the National Resources Committee advocating the conservation of our national resources, especially oil, it is with added significance that I call your attention to the importance of H. R. 4109.

Admittedly, from many authoritative sources, there is an inexhaustible supply of hard coal, and I believe that if an anthracite laboratory is provided by the Federal Government, it will fulfill the twofold purpose of creating new uses for anthracite and substantially aid in carrying out the program of conserving other national resources, the supply of which is limited.

The anthracite-coal industry is our basic and fundamental industry. It is the backbone of all our business enterprises. We have few diversified industries in the region. The existence and prosperity of our people, therefore, must depend on the utilization and mining of anthracite coal.

FORMATION OF ANTHRACITE COAL

In my studies I find the word "anthracite" is derived from the Greek word "anthrax," meaning coal of fossil substances which kindle and burn like wood. Historical records seem to indicate that the first recorded mention of anthracite was made by Theo Phrastus, in 371 B. C., in a treatise on stones. This historian records that it was found in Liguria and Elis and was used by smiths. We find today, however, the words "anthracite" and "hard coal" are synonymous.

It is now generally recognized that anthracite, like all coal, was formed from the vegetation of prehistoric forests. The story of the formation of anthracite coal is in itself an intensely interesting romance.

Geologists in general practical language, tell us that trees and ferns which grew to gigantic size and unparalleled dimensions in an atmosphere very large in carbon dioxide, fell, rotted, and decayed, thus forming a deep layer of decayed plant life. In time the earth's surface moved and submerged this vegetation beneath an ocean covering the earth with mud and sand.

Centuries and centuries passed, and thousands of years later the earth rose out of the water and was again covered with vegetation. Submersion again followed, and in the course of many centuries this process was repeated a number of times. The combined forces of heat and pressure transformed the mud and sand of the ocean bed into rock and every separate layer of former bituminous vegetation hardened successively into peat, lignite, soft—or bituminous—coal and finally into anthracite.

Then as the result of vital earthquakes and the erosion of glaciers many miles in thickness, these fields of anthracite in eastern Pennsylvania, which I have previously referred to, were left in their present uneven and disconnected form.

Scientists and geologists, in relating this marvelous romance, tell us further that as the earth's surface cooled and contracted, our beautiful hills and valleys in eastern Pennsylvania were formed.

These beds of anthracite were correspondingly twisted with the result that anthracite now lies in a number of basins or veins extending roughly parallel to each other in a northeastern, southwestern direction. In many instances—in fact, in most instances—the centers of these veins of coal are many feet underground, while the edges or outcroppings frequently coincide with the surface of the earth. When this latter condition is the case it is possible to readily secure coal by shoveling or stripping directly from the surface. But in the majority of instances, however, it is necessary to sink deep shafts or slopes in order to reach the coal in or near the bottom of the veins.

According to geology classifications, therefore, these basins of anthracite coal in eastern Pennsylvania have been grouped into four primary divisions known as the northern, eastern middle, western middle, and southern fields. In the northeastern extremity of this territory these basins slope in rather gentle curves, while in other sections, particularly in my district, the warping of the earth's surface during the glacier era was much more severe, with the result that the coal beds frequently lie in a vertical position and in some cases have sometimes even been completely overturned since the original formation.

According to no less an authority than Dr. A. C. Fieldner, of the Federal Bureau of Mines, anthracite coal in Pennsylvania was discovered as early as 1762, and that the first Lehigh coal mining company was formed in 1793. We find, however, that it was not until about 1812 that the "black stones" of eastern Pennsylvania began to receive recognition on the Philadelphia market as being a highly desirable domestic fuel. In 1830, the first American-built locomotive used anthracite, and in 1835 this fuel was burned on the steamship Portland. In 1839 the application of hot blast to Mauch Chunk and Pottsville blast furnaces started an important industrial use for anthracite that persisted for over half a century. By 1838, the yearly production reached $1,000,000, and that year may be taken as the beginning of anthracite as an important American fuel.

It can, therefore, be seen that anthracite coal was the first of our mineral fuels to find extensive domestic and industrial use. It is, therefore, equally true that it would naturally also be the first fuel to experience the exhaustion of easily mineable beds. It is, therefore, my humble and frank opinion that if the anthracite industry is to continue and survive that we must apply progressive mining methods and research in developing means and methods for increasing the utilization of anthracite coal products.

Naturally, I am interested in scientific achievements. For years I have been engaged in the practice of medicine and I have been in close contact with the achievements of science in the fields of chemistry, biology, and related sciences.

I know something of the progress science has made in combating contagious diseases and in the improvement of our health and sanitary conditions. I, therefore, can be expected to have an appreciation of the value of scientific research and the importance and application of fundamental and applied research work. It is with this in view that I have for some time been devoting attention to the possibility of scientific chemical and engineering research in the development of new uses for anthracite coal and its products.

FARM PRODUCTS RESEARCH

My interest in this matter has been renewed and strengthened by the recent action of the Department of Agriculture in the establishment of regional laboratories for scientific research in the utilization of farm products at Wyndmoor, Montgomery County, Pa.; New Orleans, La.; Peoria, Ill.; and Albany, Calif.

In section 202 (a) of the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1938:

The Secretary is authorized and directed to establish, equip, and maintain four regional research laboratories, one in each major farm-producing area, and at such places to conduct researches into and to develop new scientific, chemical, and technical uses and new and extended markets and outlets for farm commodities and products and byproducts thereof. Such research and development shall be devoted primarily to those farm commodities in which there are regular or seasonal surpluses and their products and byproducts.

Press releases issued by the Department of Agriculture on February 10 contain detailed information about the location and design of these four regional laboratories at the points stated. The buildings are being designed as centers for carrying on chemical engineering and related research by a staff of approximately 250 persons, consisting of chemists, engineers, and other trained technologists.

The primary purpose of these laboratories is to find and develop new uses of farm commodities in the region in which they are located.

The eastern regional laboratory to be located at Wyndmoor, for instance, will devote attention to new uses for potatoes, tobacco, milk products, apples, and vegetables.

The southern regional laboratory at New Orleans will give attention to cotton, peanuts, sweetpotatoes, and other foods generally produced.

The northern regional laboratory located at Peoria will give attention to corn, wheat, and agricultural wastes from the farm area in the Middle West.

The western regional laboratory to be located at Albany, Calif., will direct attention to surplus fruits, vegetables, wheat, potatoes, and alfalfa and similar crops.

PROPOSED LINES OF RESEARCH ON UTILIZATION OF ANTHRACITE COAL

It is very gratifying to me, as a scientifically trained man, to see this splendid development in the Department of Agriculture, whereby the chemists, engineers, and other technologists in the Department are going to exert every effort to develop new uses for surplus farm commodities in the various regions in which these regional laboratories are located.

I have followed very closely the developments in connection with the utilization of soybeans in various industries and regard this new undertaking in the Department of Agriculture as one of the most constructive steps taken by the Department to bring the scientist into the field as a direct aid and help to the farmers of this country.

I therefore feel that scientific research can be used in a similar manner in affording relief to the depressed anthracite miners in my district and in eastern Pennsylvania. I am convinced that science can render a most important service in the development of new uses for utilization of our valuable anthracite deposits.

In my studies of the anthracite situation in my own district I have endeavored to secure the advice of chemists and engineers not only in the industry but in scientific institutions, State and Federal agencies. I have given considerable attention to this subject and I have had an outline prepared of some proposed lines of research on the utilization of anthracite coal that would be of vital importance to all engaged in coal mining, including both the operators and miners of eastern Pennsylvania.

In preparing this research program, recognition has been made of the marked advances in methods of transportation and communication, and the increased need and demand for satisfactory motor fuels.

As a very marked example, the development of the automobile to its present outstanding position in both domestic and industrial fields has resulted in a tremendous demand for gasoline. The supply of gasoline has always been plentiful but will it continue to be so from the present sources of production?

Already serious questions have been raised regarding our oil reserve, and experts are predicting a marked depletion in future years. Just how long it will be possible to discover new oil reserves is now a much-debatable question. Some prominent authorities think a decline may begin within the next 10 years, while others estimate it will be a little longer period. At any rate, it is generally recognized that all oil resources are being depleted, and active measures should be adopted for the conservation of this valuable natural resource.

So the fact that gasoline, which is now produced from petroleum, a mineral resource which we confidently believe will some day be exhausted, the study of new sources of substitute fuel, such as coal, oil shale, and farm crops, should be encouraged by the Federal Government.

We have extensive deposits of coal and oil shale in the United States, and methods for producing gasoline and motor fuels from them should be actively prosecuted and the practicability of these methods from the economic and cost point of view should be definitely determined.

We note that farm crops, for instance, especially grains and tubers, can be malted and fermented to produce ethyl alcohol, a liquid which chemists tell us can very well be used in place of gasoline. It has been suggested that this alcohol made from farm crops be blended with gasoline as a practical source of motor fuel, and I am sure science will determine in the next few years the practicability of this process. It is again a very splendid example of the value of scientific research in solving these important national problems.

HEATING VALUE OF ANTHRACITE

It is interesting to observe that when we think of gasoline as a symbol of concentrated fuel we find that a small lump of anthracite coal will yield nearly $1\frac{1}{2}$ times as much heat as the same volume of gasoline. The several percent of hydrogen which anthracite coal contains gives it considerable advantage, for instance over coke, in heating value. It is seldom realized that Pennsylvania anthracite contains from 400 to 1,000 more British thermal units per pound than by-product or Beehive coke of the same ash and moisture contents. These statements can be verified from analyses made by the United States Bureau of Mines.

For example, their Report of Investigations, No. 3283, shows that the moisture-free analysis of domestic sizes—egg, stove, chestnut, and pea—of Pennsylvania anthracite samples from 41 coal breakers averages 9.9 percent ash and 13,535 British thermal units per pound. Their Report of Investigations, No. 2980, states that the typical composition of moisture-free, high-temperature coke is 10 percent ash and 12,900 British thermal units per pound. In other words, while the ash contents of the typical coke and anthracite coal are almost identical, the anthracite has 635 more British thermal units per pound, which amounts to 5 percent more heat units.

I am told the explanation for the higher heating value of anthracite as compared with coke lies in its extra hydrogen content, since hydrogen has the highest heating value of any substance. Although bituminous coal contains more hydrogen than anthracite, it also contains more oxygen, which has no heating value.

It is generally agreed by combustion engineers that there is therefore no other fuel, whether solid, liquid, or gaseous, that is so concentrated as anthracite and which contains so many heat units per cubic inch. It is not my purpose in this speech, however, to enter into any more details regarding the heating and combustion advantages of anthracite coal.

I am particularly interested at this time in directing attention to the national importance and significance of scientific research looking to the development of new uses for anthracite coal and its products. It is therefore very evident to me that many of the following lines of research should be undertaken as soon as possible for the utilization of anthracite coal:

PROPOSED RESEARCH

First. Anthracite coal as a source of liquid fuels for automotive needs:

- (1) Passenger automobiles.
- (2) Diesel engine power on (a) trucks, (b) busses, (c) railroads, (d) stationary power plant, (e) marine engines.

Second. Anthracite coal as source of compressed gas and producer gas for motor fuel:

(a) Gas-producer-driven motor vehicles. Gas-producer-driven motor vehicles, principally trucks and busses, have received extended trials in England, Germany, and France. Although wood charcoal is the preferred fuel, anthracite and low-temperature coke have given satisfactory service. In 1936 about 800 gas-producer-equipped trucks and busses were operating in Germany. Encouraging experimental results have also been obtained in England and France.

Third. Anthracite coal for gas production:

- (a) Possibility as future fuel in gas producers for heavier types of motor vehicles, (b) source of hydrogen for liquefaction of bituminous coal or for production of synthetic hydrocarbons, (c) source of fuel for water gas and gas producers, (d) possibility of use as raw material for production of synthetic products from carbon monoxide and hydrogen, (e) production of water gas by utilization of off-peak electrical energy for heating anthracite fuel beds and passage of steam through the bed, (f) utilization of anthracite coal in processes for gasification of carbonaceous materials.

Fourth. Hydrogenation of anthracite coal:

- (1) Heavy oil production for use in (a) Diesel motors, (b) furnaces.
- (2) Gasoline production for use as (a) motor fuel, (b) solvents.

Fifth. Liquefaction of anthracite coal:

- (1) Emulsified finely ground coal for use as (a) Diesel-engine fuel, (b) furnace oil.
- (2) Heat treatment for use as (a) Diesel-engine fuel, (b) furnace oil.

Sixth. Grinding of anthracite:

- (1) Pulverized form for use in (a) steam generation, (b) Diesel engine, (c) household heating.

Seventh. Blending of anthracite coal:

- (1) Heavy oil blended with (1) regular anthracite coal sizes, (2) pulverized anthracite coal.

For use as (a) steam generation, (b) household heating.
 (2) Bituminous coal blended with (1) fine anthracite.

For use as (a) steam generation, (b) household heating.

- Eighth. Chemical Utilization of anthracite coal for use as
 (a) filtering media, (b) scrubbing, (c) conversions, (d) carbonization.

Ninth. Anthracite ash utilization:

- (a) Soil conditioner, (b) steel alloying with fine coal, (c) chemical utilization of ash constituents.

Tenth. Anthracite for producer gas:

- (a) Power production, (b) city gas, (c) gas engine.

ANTHRACITE RESEARCH LABORATORY

The results of my studies and surveys of the anthracite coal situation in Pennsylvania and the importance of making early provision for the initiation of a program of scientific research on the utilization of anthracite coal has encouraged me to prepare and introduce my bill, H. R. 4109, which puts the Federal Government back of the anthracite coal miner in his fight for future existence.

My bill provides for the establishment by the Department of the Interior, of an anthracite research laboratory in eastern Pennsylvania to carry out a broad and extensive program such as I have referred to. My bill provides sufficient funds for the operation and maintenance of this research laboratory to permit the Department of the Interior to carry out this program and I will greatly appreciate the cooperation of the Members of the House in making possible this program, which means so much to the entire population in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania.

I expect to again address the House in further detail on this important subject, regarding and pertaining to the safety and health in anthracite coal mining operation. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the House to a bit of testimony in a National Labor Relations Board case which is now being tried in St. Louis and concerning the conduct of the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board.

I am not in a position to offer the official transcript, and I am depending upon press accounts which have just reached me. But since the descriptions of the testimony are virtually the same in the three St. Louis newspapers I have every reason to believe their accuracy.

Briefly, the testimony is this:

Mrs. Ethel Spangler, a former organizer for the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, who was one of the complainants for the union against the Forest City Manufacturing Co., testified that Thurlow Smoot, attorney for the Labor Board, and Miss Eva Lackey, another organizer of the union, asked Mrs. Spangler's daughter to testify falsely against the company.

Mrs. Spangler testified at the hearing that this Labor Board attorney and union organizer attempted to induce Miss Violet Spangler to testify that she was fired for union activity, and after the daughter explained that she had never been a member of the union and had quit the company voluntarily they still insisted that she sign a statement to the effect that she had been fired for union activity.

Mrs. Spangler testified that the Labor Board attorney, Mr. Smoot, and the union organizer told her daughter that they did not care whether she was a member of the union or not, and that she would get paid enough to open a beauty parlor of her own.

Now, this is not the first instance of reprehensible activity by the St. Louis officials of the National Labor Relations Board. During the last session of Congress I referred to the official transcript of the case against the Ford Motor Co., in which three witnesses were prevented from testifying that they had been told by the Labor Board regional office that they would be incriminating themselves if they did not join the C. I. O., which at that time was attempting to organize the workers in the St. Louis branch of the Ford Motor Co.

But the trial examiner in this case would not permit this testimony to be admitted and it had to be put in the record by offers of proof.

Also, in the case against the International Shoe Co. at Hannibal, Mo., it is general information that the Labor Board attorney made speeches at meetings called against the company and pleaded with those in the complaint not to desert the union and made promises of back pay for all the time the case was in litigation.

I notice also, Mr. Chairman, in yesterday's press dispatches a statement from Dr. Towne Nylander, Los Angeles regional director of the Labor Board, to the effect that he was misquoted in the statement that "When we go into a hearing the employer hasn't got a chance," which statement was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

The Labor Board has suddenly become very religious. It suspended Dr. Nylander. Yet the Board knows if it reads the transcripts of its cases, that a year ago an attempt was made to introduce as evidence in one of the aircraft cases virtually the same statement by Dr. Nylander. The gentleman from California knows that those who have followed the proceedings of the Labor Board in southern California are quite familiar with the policy of Dr. Nylander, and the Board in not giving the employer a chance.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come for Congress to quit shadow-boxing on this question of the Labor Board's activity and its personnel. I urge the membership of this House to support the resolution I introduced some time ago and which is now before the Rules Committee, calling for a complete and thorough investigation of the National Labor Relations Board and its personnel.

Mr. Chairman, there is no longer any question or doubt that the Labor Board personnel, in its attempt to build up a statistical record to justify its existence, has used the bait of back pay for the purpose of creating labor strife instead of eliminating it.

Mr. Chairman, while I have no personal knowledge of attempts by Labor Board attorneys to have witnesses to testify falsely, I do know that in the Ford case in St. Louis the Labor Board attorney, when put on the stand by the respondent's attorney, admitted that he knew and permitted one of his witnesses to testify falsely. And I do say without fear of contradiction that the Labor Board regional office in my district, St. Louis, has been used for the purpose of particular union organization activities and the promotion of labor strife.

I feel that the time has come when we must look inside and see what is going on. I urge you to consider my resolution calling for an investigation of the National Labor Relations Board, its conduct and personnel. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON] 15 minutes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, with the convening of Congress, the open season for political sniping was begun. Critics of the President and the administration have been using this forum to lay down a barrage of criticism and condemnation. Of course, this is their right and privilege, which no one would deny them.

Our Republican colleagues, realizing that their party is short in voting power, have tried to compensate for it by the exercise of vocal power. They realize full well that it is easier to criticize than it is to construct, and the role of the complainer and the faultfinder requires more talking than it does thinking.

There has been some constructive criticism and this the Members of the House and the people of the country always welcome. An eminent textbook writer I think well said, "The informing function of Congress is equally as important as its legislative function." But many of the speeches at this session have been scant in information, consisting principally of loose talking, actuated in many instances by political animosity and prompted by political expediency. But even this I am willing to forgive, for I realize that politics is politics, and under the two-party system the party that is out must, or they think they must, continually bombard the party that is in.

There is one subject, however, upon which I draw the line, and even my political tolerance, and I believe my service in this House justifies me in claiming to be tolerant, will not permit me to remain silent or go unchallenged. I refer to the reckless, extravagant, and unjustified attacks made upon our Government in its foreign policy and its relations to other governments. I am referring specifically to those who, actuated either by partisan politics or hostility and hatred of the President and his administration, here and elsewhere constantly seek to discredit the President of the United States, our Secretary of State, and our Government in their dealings with the other countries of the world. Radio speeches, statements to the press, and this forum are used by some of these carping critics in leveling a barrage of condemnation at every act or word of the President and his Secretary of State which relate to foreign affairs or our relations to other governments. I am not talking about the constructive and conscientious critic, but of the chronic complainer who talks and thinks afterward.

The realm of criticism relating to domestic policies and foreign policies differs widely. Unfounded criticism of domestic legislation will not do irreparable injury, for the American people, for whose ears it is intended, know how to discount extravagant statements or denunciations, and out of the furor of debate and the cooling time which intervenes before election, they will evolve the truth, for we Americans understand one another. But a reckless, extravagant, or unjustified statement condemning the President's act or word relating to foreign policies will be published and heard, not only here but abroad, and when reproduced in the foreign press will be magnified rather than minimized, and though the critic may be in a hopeless minority, possibly voicing his own sentiment alone, it will be cited abroad as an evidence that America is divided and the President is not backed up or sustained by his own people. Such form of criticism may give aid and comfort to other governments with which we are in dispute, but certainly not to our own.

The founders of our Government vested in the President of the United States the handling of our foreign relations, and in him alone is vested the power of initiating negotiations.

Those who challenge the right of the President to act in our relations to foreign governments display an ignorance of the power and function of the Chief Executive under our form of government.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of United States against Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation and others, in an opinion delivered in December 1936, reviewed at length the historical background and the constitutional power of the President in this regard. It was therein pointed out that the Federal power over external or foreign affairs differed greatly from the Government's power over internal or domestic affairs; that with respect to domestic affairs the power of the Federal Government is limited, while there is no limitation or reservation of power in the States as to foreign or external affairs, and in this sphere unlimited power is vested in the Federal Government. Furthermore, that in dealing with foreign governments the power to consider and initiate negotiations is vested exclusively in the President of the United States. I quote from the Court's opinion in that case:

Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate, and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation. He makes treaties, with the advice and consent of the Senate, but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude, and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument on March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, "The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations."

The opinion of the Court in this same case also quote with approval an excerpt from a report made to the Senate of the United States by its Committee on Foreign Relations at a very early day in our history, on February 15, 1816, which reads as follows:

The President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. He manages our concerns with foreign nations and must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success. For his conduct he is responsible to the Constitution. The committee considers this responsibility the surest pledge for the faithful discharge of his duty.

We think the interference of the Senate in the direction of foreign negotiations calculated to diminish that responsibility and thereby to impair the best security for the national safety.

The nature of transactions with foreign nations, moreover, requires caution and unity of design, and their success frequently depends on secrecy and dispatch (8 U. S. Senate Reports, Committee on Foreign Relations, p. 24).

The Supreme Court, further speaking in the same case, said:

It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation, which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field, must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved.

Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular, and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results.

Indeed, so clearly is this true that the first President refused to accede to a request to lay before the House of Representatives the instructions, correspondence, and documents relating to the negotiation of the Jay treaty—a refusal the wisdom of which was recognized by the House itself and has never since been doubted. In his reply to the request, President George Washington said:

"The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principles on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent." (1 Messages and Papers of the Presidents, p. 194.)

Further quoting from the same opinion of the Court, I read:

The marked difference between foreign affairs and domestic affairs in this respect is recognized by both Houses of Congress in the very form of their requisitions for information from the executive departments. In the case of every department except the Department of State, the resolution directs the official to furnish the information. In the case of the State Department dealing with foreign affairs, the President is requested to furnish the information, "if not compatible with the public interest." A statement that to furnish the information is not compatible with the public interest, rarely, if ever, is questioned.

This opinion was rendered by the Supreme Court in upholding an act of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in prohibiting the exportation of arms to Paraguay and Bolivia, under an act of Congress authorizing him so to do when he found that by so doing it might contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries. Its validity was challenged on the ground that Congress had no power to delegate its law-making power to the President. It was a unanimous decision, except for the dissent of Mr. Justice McReynolds. The majority of the Supreme Court, at the time of the rendition of the opinion, was not of the same political faith as that of the President, and the writer of the opinion was Mr. Justice Sutherland, a Republican and a former Member of the Senate of the United States. I mention this to show that by no stretch of the imagination could it be charged that the opinion was actuated by political bias in favor of the President. It was a clear-cut judicial finding and clarifies the power of the President in dealing with international affairs.

I have quoted at length from this opinion not because of any interest at the moment in the statute construed or the particular legal question therein decided but because it is a clear enunciation and an authoritative declaration by the highest court in the land as to the power and the duty of the President in dealing with foreign problems. In these days of excitement, political turmoil, and criticism it is well to get our bearings and calmly consider and determine first what is the President's authority and responsibility, and this opinion tells us in judicial language, fortified by a historical review and background of our early history and quotations from eminent statesmen, just what part the President is expected and required to take in carrying on our relations with other governments.

To those critics of the President who charge that the President is meddling where he has no business, I would remind them that under our Constitution and laws the President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. It is his job and his business, and he would be recreant to his duty if he failed so to do.

To those critics who, in order to try to bring odium and reproach upon the President in his dealings with other governments, have charged that he has inaugurated a policy of secret diplomacy, I would say that the President has been frank and outspoken, not only with his own people but with the nations abroad; but if secrecy in any degree has been maintained, I would remind his critics that no less an authority than George Washington, while he was President, in a message to Congress, quoted in the opinion which I read, declared that the success of negotiations required secrecy and that necessity of secrecy in dealing with foreign nations was one reason why the power so to do was vested in the President. And that from every administration since Washington's it has always been the recognized and uniform policy to accord to the President and the Department of State the right of secrecy when in the President's judgment it was required. Every Congress, beginning with Washington's time to now, has recognized and accorded this right to the President and the Department of State, and none know this better than some of the most blatant critics who have been crying "secret diplomacy."

To those critics of the President, both in Congress and out of Congress, who claim to know just how our foreign affairs should be conducted, and who glibly criticize an isolated act here and another one there, let me remind them that not only is the President of the United States the only official of our Government vested with power under the law to deal with foreign governments but that he of all persons is in a position to be best informed on conditions abroad. He and his Secretary of State know better than anyone else what is happening in the various countries of the world and the effect of such happenings both here and abroad. Let me read again three sentences I have already quoted from the opinion in the Curtiss-Wright case:

Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular, and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results.

Our Department of State is the clearing house of happenings in every nook and corner of the globe that may directly or indirectly affect our own country or the peace of the world. There is recorded not only a record of such happenings but the confidential report of the result of investigations made by our representatives abroad as to secret or undisclosed reasons prompting such happenings, and the reaction to such happenings by the people in the country which is the scene of their enactment, and other reports of their effect on citizens of other countries. The habits, customs, and character of peoples differ, and the same act will affect the people of one nationality entirely differently from those of another. It is only by having personal representatives of this Government in other countries, who know the people of such countries, that accurate information can be acquired as to happenings, their motive, and effect. The individual who only has fragmentary information gained from the press about some event happening in a remote country of the world, where he has never been and about the character and customs of whose people he knows nothing, expounds dogmatic opinions and criticizes the President and the Secretary of State for doing or not doing what he with his scant information believes should be done. It was to avoid mistakes of this kind that the power to deal and negotiate with foreign countries was centered in the President, and he was given the Secretary of State and his Department, with their foreign representatives, to secure for him the fullest information so that he might act intelligently and not in the dark.

The international relations of a country is always a delicate matter, requiring tact, diplomacy, and unanimity of support, if such dealings are to be effective. Even in normal times this is true, but when the whole world is on the brink of a volcanic eruption, such as now prevails, this is doubly true.

There are those who do not like President Roosevelt, some who actually entertain bitter feelings of hostility against him, but he is the President of the United States and as such is entitled to the respect of the American people. All polls of every kind indicate that a majority of the American people still believe in him.

President Roosevelt and his able Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, are charged with the responsibility of steering our Nation through a very troubled and tempestuous international sea, and I am convinced, and the American people are convinced, that they are striving as best they can to steer us safely, maintain our own self-respect and the respect of other nations, and bring us safely to the harbor of peace. Constant and carping criticism will not aid them, but rather hinder and embarrass them. There may be acts or words spoken at times that may not seem to square with your idea of what should be done, but we must remember that we do not know the entire situation, and isolated instances may be related to other acts and facts of which we are not aware.

It will not help him, either with our people at home or those abroad, to impugn his motives and denounce him as a war monger or as instigator of war. These charges are groundless and false, as those who make them well know them to be, but the foreign press give the widest publicity to adverse criticism, especially of the inflammatory type. President Roosevelt is a great humanitarian, and an enemy of war and a lover of peace, and I do not think that any President was ever actuated by a higher or purer motive to best serve his country and preserve peace than he, and that is exactly what he is striving to do.

Those who cry longest and loudest for peace do not always know best how it may be attained. Mere declaration that we are for peace, and shouting shibboleths of peace to warring nations will not prevent war, but may cause acts of aggression that will provoke it.

Communities infested with bandits have long since learned that you cannot suppress banditry by telling the outlaws you are for peace and do not want to have any trouble with them. Fear instilled in the heart of the bandit is the only deterrent.

There are bandit governments abroad in the world today seeking whom they may devour and who, by the use of brute force, having no regard for the law of God or man or the sanctity of treaties or international law, are crushing other governments, taking territory which does not belong to them and destroying human life as their own selfish greed dictates. So long as these bandit governments are loose and wreaking their vengeance, no milk-and-water policy of mere kind words and appeasement will suffice to deter them. England, for several years, has followed the policy of appeasement with these dictator nations, and each act of appeasement has only brought them nearer to the brink of war, and the imminence of war today is partly attributable to a lack of firmness of the democracies of the world in meeting the demands of the dictators. Firmness, fairness, and fearlessness are required by the United States today in its dealings with other governments. We want no war, we covet no territory, we crave peace; but we realize, from the bitter experience of the past, that the world is so small—and science and invention have made it even smaller than it was 20 years ago—that the outbreak of another European world war will desperately and dangerously hazard our own peace. Strive as we undoubtedly would and should to prevent our involvement, the danger of our being inexorably swept into its awful vortex is so great that I shudder at its contemplation. Peace in Europe is our best insurance for peace in America.

The United States is the world's greatest democracy and the richest and most powerful of the nations of the earth; and, in my judgment, the firm policy of our Government in dealing with other countries, coupled with our rearmament program, has already had a psychological effect in deterring and discouraging the outbreak of a general war in Europe. Indeed, many believe that but for it, war might already have been begun.

I regret the necessity of spending large sums for armament, and if conditions were normal throughout the world, no such necessity would exist. But so long as the rule of brute force and not reason, and the doctrine that might makes right is the controlling motive of major governments, the peace of the world is menaced and we must be prepared to meet conditions as they exist.

We recall that in Washington's Farewell Address, read a few days ago in this Chamber, was contained this admonition, "To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace."

We do not want to be the world's policeman, but common prudence demands that we must be prepared to adequately police America and all parts of it against all attacks from foreign governments, and thereby maintain the Monroe Doctrine and give notice to the dictators of the earth that we are prepared and will defend our country and its people against the aggressions of those who seek by force to dominate the world.

"Let us mind our own business" is the popular slogan of some of these superficial and thoughtless critics who take no thought of tomorrow or the awful consequences to our own country if another world war breaks in all its fury. If the President of the United States, in his dealings with other countries of the world, is aiding even in a slight degree in the lessening of the probability of war, he is "minding our own business" and is rendering a service to America for which the American people will forever hold him in grateful remembrance. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

THE FIRST CONGRESS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION

"Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set." (Proverbs 22: 29.)

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday in this legislative Chamber, in the presence of the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and other distinguished visitors, and in pursuance of House Concurrent Resolution 4, we will meet for the purpose of commemorating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the First Congress of the United States under the Constitution.

It is fitting and proper that we should do this. In thus honoring our legislative predecessors we honor ourselves; for no true student of history can study the times, the conditions, the men, the institutions of the period of 150 years ago and not realize that ours is a goodly heritage. And that those who laid the legislative foundations of our National Government were master workmen worthy of all commendation.

As we read the Annals of that First Congress under the Constitution, our imaginations are quickened, our memories refreshed, our sense of responsibility is deepened and there wells up within us the heartfelt appreciation of the lives, the characters, the deeds, and the accomplishments of these, our ancient brethren in the Congress of the United States.

For on the foundations they laid upon the abiding rock of the Constitution there has been reared the finest structure of constitutional government, of civil liberty, of freedom of the individual that this world has ever known. So in the words of the sweet singer of the heart songs of life:

Walk about Zion, and go round about her; number the towers thereof; mark ye well her bulwarks; consider her palaces: That ye may tell it to the generation following.

Thus their works do follow them.

In his work, Our Wonderland of Bureaucracy, the late James M. Beck, former Solicitor General of the United States, and a former Member of this House, states:

When in 1789 the curtain first arose upon a new form of government for the American Commonwealth, it consisted of a roll of parchment, George Washington, and Congress.

The merits of the first and the virtues of the second have been eloquently extolled, it is now my desire to pay this small tribute to the memory of the third.

And now, if we may stir up your pure minds by way of recollection, we will ask you to think for a little while on that period in our national life, of 150 years ago, in the early formative period of our country. For it is a far cry from a little group of earnest men assembled at Annapolis, Md., in September 1786 for the purpose of "remedying the defects of the Federal Government" to the scene that will be enacted Saturday in this magnificent structure wherein unite the crowning glories of architecture, the idealizing dream of the architect, the chiseling stroke of the sculptor, the brilliant hues of the artist's brush, all skillfully united under the guiding mind of the thoughtful artificer whose silent yet shaping hands fabricated this Capitol into a thing of marvelous beauty and symmetry.

For just as we can trace the erection of this beautiful edifice from that September day in 1793 when President Washington laid the cornerstone of this building, destined to house the greatest deliberative legislative bodies in the world, within its spacious confines, just so can we trace the constitutional history of this Congress from that little gathering of September 11-14, 1786, for in that assembly, among others, there met Egbert Benson, of New York; George Read and Richard Bassett, of Delaware; James Schureman, of New Jersey; and James Madison, Jr., of Virginia, four of whom not only had sat in the Continental Congress prior to the calling of the Constitutional Convention of 1787, but three of whom were likewise destined to sit in that glorious Convention, and all five of whom were to be Representatives in the First Congress under the Constitution; and to George Read is accorded the additional honor of being one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

Significant indeed are the closing words of the proceedings of that meeting in which we read as follows, referring to the attitude of the several States represented:

And use their endeavors to procure the concurrence of the other States in the appointment of commissioners to meet at Philadelphia on the second Monday in May next to take into consideration the situation of the United States to devise such further provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union, and to report such an act for that purpose to the United States in Congress assembled as when agreed to by them and afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State, will effectually provide for the same. (Dated at Annapolis, September 14, 1786.)

The story of the Federal Convention and its hand work are still fresh in our minds, but let us always remember that the Constitution devised in those days from May to September 1787 is still, after 150 years, the greatest bulwark of human liberty in the world.

We know full well the contents of the resolution of the Federal Convention, dated September 17, 1787, submitting the Constitution to Congress, and likewise do we keep in mind the resolution of Congress of September 28, 1787, submitting the Constitution to the several States; and we all remember in grateful appreciation that it was on the 21st day of June 1788 that New Hampshire ratified the Constitution and thus, under its own terms, brought it into being and made it effective.

We are the creatures of that Constitution, for by the provisions of section 1 of article I—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

But it is in the resolution of Congress dated July 2, 1788, submitting ratification of the Constitution to a committee wherein the story of our legislative, executive, and judicial lives begins to unfold, for there we read:

The State of New Hampshire having ratified the Constitution, transmitted to them by the act of the 28th of September last and transmitted to Congress their ratification; and the same being read, the President reminded Congress that this was the ninth ratification transmitted and laid before them.

On motion of Mr. Clarke, seconded by Mr. Edwards:

Ordered, That the ratifications of the Constitution of the United States transmitted to Congress be referred to a committee to examine the same and report an act to Congress for putting the said Constitution into operation in pursuance of the resolutions of the late Federal Convention.

And finally in the "resolution of the Congress of September 13, 1788, fixing date for election of a President and the organization of the Government under the Constitution, in the city of New York," that we learn the final story of how we came into existence.

Congress assembled: Present, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and from Rhode Island Mr. Arnold, and from Delaware Mr. Kearny.

Whereas the convention assembled in Philadelphia pursuant to the resolution of Congress on the 21st of February 1787 did on the 1st of September in the same year report to the United States in Congress assembled a Constitution for the people of the United States, whereupon Congress on the 28th of the same September did resolve unanimously:

That the said report with the resolutions and letter accompanying the same be transmitted to the several legislatures in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof in conformity to the resolves of the convention made and provided in that case; and

Whereas transmitted to the several legislatures has been ratified in the manner therein declared to be sufficient for the establishment of the same and such ratifications duly authenticated have been received by Congress and are filed in the office of the Secretary: Therefore

Resolved, That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States, which before the said day shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for a President; and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time and the present seat of Congress the place for commencing proceedings under the said Constitution.

The preliminaries are thus completed, and now we turn for a moment to witness the closing scenes of the Continental Congress, which for so long a time had ineffectually sought to unite the Colonies under the persuasive but noneffective provisions of the Articles of Confederation. The Continental Congress then called the Congress of the Confederation, at that time was sitting in the City Hall.

It had removed from Trenton, N. J., on December 24, 1784, and its first session in the city of New York opened on January 11, 1785. Its final session covered the period from November 3, 1788, to March 2, 1789.

Its last president was Cyrus Griffin, of Virginia, and its secretary was Charles Thomson, of Pennsylvania, who was first elected on September 5, 1774, and had served continuously in that capacity until the closing day, March 2, 1789.

THE PLACE OF MEETING—FEDERAL HALL

The Congress of the Confederation had its final roll call on October 10, 1788. Only 20 delegates answered to their names and there was no quorum of States. It is stated that every day four or five delegates would meet in a room in the City Hall, in New York, where the Congress had sat for 4 years, have Secretary Thomson record their names in the journal and then disperse. It was a moribund assemblage.

On March 2, 1789, only one delegate appeared, and the Continental Congress ended its existence.

At sunset on March 3, 1789, 13 guns were fired from the old fort on the Battery, in New York, to indicate that the confederation had come to an end; and at sunrise on the 4th, also at noon and at night, salutes were fired and the bells of the churches were rung to welcome the birth of the new constitutional Government.

The old City Hall, in Wall Street, at the head of Broad Street, where the Subtreasury of the United States now stands, had been prepared for the use of the First Congress under the Constitution. When it was determined to transform the old building into a Federal Hall for the new Congress, the merchants of New York subscribed $32,500 for the purpose. The work of construction was given into the hands of Maj. Pierre Charles L'Enfant.

The Representatives room was 61 by 58 feet and 36 feet to the ceiling. It was octagonal in form. The Senate Chamber was 40 by 30 and 20 feet in height. Besides these Halls of Congress there were also committee rooms, spacious lobbies, and a guard room on the floor above, for it was then the custom for the Regular Army to protect the building and its occupants.

The Senate Chamber and the Hall of Representatives presented an exceedingly handsome appearance with fine mahogany desks and chairs, national flags in festoons, and large paintings. The chairs of the presiding officers had rich silken canopies over them.

Entering from Broad Street there was a square room open to the public, the room of the Representatives was to the left and the Senate Chamber to the right.

New York at that time had a population of 25,000 and was a thriving, bustling community.

The First Congress held three sessions.

North Carolina not having ratified the Constitution until November 21, 1789, was not represented in the first session; nor was Rhode Island, which did not ratify the Constitution until May 29, 1790. Hence only 11 States were represented in the first session which extended from March 4, 1789, to September 29, 1789. The proceedings of both the Senate and the House for the first few days of this session are set out below.

The second session began on January 4, 1790, and terminated on August 12, 1790. In the House a quorum was not had until Thursday, January 7, and in the Senate on the 6th.

These two sessions were held in New York City.

The following entry, taken from the proceedings of the House, on Thursday, August 12, 1790, being the closing day of the second session, explains that a change in the place of meeting was to be made:

Agreeably to the concurrent vote of the two Houses an adjournment took place this day—to meet in the city of Philadelphia on the first Monday in December next. Previous to the adjournment an unanimous vote passed both Houses, returning thanks to the corporation of this city for the elegant and convenient accommodations furnished the Congress of the United States.

Adjourned sine die.

The third session was held in Philadelphia, commencing on the first Monday of December (6th) 1790, and terminating on the 3d of March 1791.

THE THIRD SESSION

The meetings of this last session were held in Philadelphia, in a substantial brick building erected on the southeast corner of Chestnut and Sixth Streets for a courthouse, and had been tendered to Congress by the authorities of Philadelphia and Major L'Enfant was again called upon to put this building in order. The House of Representatives occupied the entire first floor.

The Senate had a handsomely furnished chamber on the second story, where also were various rooms used by the committees and officers of Congress.

The following quotation taken from the minutes of December 11 clearly explains how this had been accomplished:

On Saturday, December 11, 1790, a letter was received from the commissioners of the city and county of Philadelphia, giving an account of the measures taken to accommodate the Federal Legislature during their residence in Philadelphia, by preparing the new courthouse in the best manner the size of the building would permit and appropriating the same to their use.

At this session a quorum was had in the House on December 7 and in the Senate on the opening day.

The following is taken from the proceedings of the House Monday, December 6, 1790:

On which day, being the day appointed by the adjournment of the two Houses for the meeting of the present session, the following Members appeared and took their seats, to wit: * * * which not forming a quorum of the whole number, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

In the Senate proceedings of the same day are these interesting entries:

James Monroe, appointed by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, in the place of John Walker, who was appointed by the Executive of said State in the room of William Grayson, deceased, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the Senate.

Then follows this entry:

A letter was read from William Paterson, Governor of the State of New Jersey, communicating the resignation of his appointment to be a Senator of the United States.

It is a matter of more than passing interest to realize that James Madison, Member of the House, and James Monroe, Member of the Senate, in the First Congress, both from Virginia, were afterward to become Presidents of the United States.

MEMBERS

The composition of the Senate and House of Representatives was as follows:

The Senators from the 11 States represented were Oliver Ellsworth and William Samuel Johnson, of Connecticut; both had been members of the Constitutional Convention and likewise Members of the Continental Congress; Richard Bassett and George Read, of Delaware; both of these had also been Members of the Constitutional Convention and the Continental Congress, and in addition thereto Read had been one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence; William Few and James Gunn, of Georgia; Few had been a Member of the Convention and of the Congress; John Henry and Charles Carroll of Carrollton, of Maryland; both had been Members of the Congress and Carroll had signed the Declaration of Independence; Tristram Dalton and Caleb Strong, of Massachusetts; Strong had attended the Convention; John Langdon and Paine Wingate, of New Hampshire; both had been members of the Congress and Langdon a member of the Convention; Jonathan Elmer, William Paterson, and Philemon Dickenson, of New Jersey; Paterson had been a member of the Convention and upon his resignation from the Senate Dickenson took his place; Elmer had been a Member of the Congress; Rufus King and Philip Schuyler, of New York; King had been a member of the Convention from Massachusetts, and both he and Schuyler had served in the Congress; William Maclay and Robert Morris, of Pennsylvania; it is from the sketches of debate in the United States Senate written by Maclay that we get such an intimate view of the Members and scenes of the first session of that body, for in its early days the Senate met behind closed doors; Robert Morris had signed the Articles of Confederation, the Declaration of Independence, had also been a Member of the Congress and the Convention; Pierce Butler and Ralph Izard, of South Carolina; both had been Members of the Congress and Butler had attended the Convention; William Grayson, John Walker, James Monroe, and Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia; upon the decease of Grayson on March 12, 1790, Walker was appointed and took his place on April 20, 1790; Monroe was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Grayson and took his seat December 6, 1790.

All but Walker had been Members of the Congress and Richard Henry Lee had been a signer of the Declaration and a member of the Convention.

North Carolina and Rhode Island had no Members in the Senate during the first session, but subsequently from North Carolina appeared Samuel Johnston and Benjamin Hawkins, both of whom had been Members of the Congress; and from Rhode Island appeared Theodore Foster and Joseph Stanton, Jr.

In the House the Members suffered nothing by comparison in ability with those in the Senate. They were Roger Sherman, Jonathan Trumbull, Benjamin Huntington, and Jeremiah Wadsworth, of Connecticut; all but Trumbull had served in the Continental Congress, and Sherman had signed the Articles of Confederation, the Declaration, and had been a member of the Convention. John Vining, of Delaware, had been a Member of the Congress. Abraham Baldwin, James Jackson, and George Matthews, of Georgia. Of these, Baldwin had served in the Congress and been a member of the Convention. Daniel Carroll, Benjamin Contee, George Gall, Joshua Seney, William Smith, and Michael Jenifer Stone, of Maryland. Carroll, Contee, Seney, and Smith had served in the Congress. Daniel Carroll had attended the Constitutional Convention. Fisher Ames, Elbridge Gerry, Benjamin Goodhue, Jonathan Grout, George Leonard, George Partridge, Theodore Sedgwick, and George Thacker, of Massachusetts. Gerry had served in the Congress, as had Partridge and Thacker, and, in addition thereto, had signed the Declaration and attended the Convention. Abiel Foster, Nicholas Gilman, Samuel Livermore, of New Hampshire. Gilman had been a member of the Convention and all three had served in the Congress. Elias Boudinot, Lambert Cadwalader, Thomas Sinnickson, and James Shureman, of New Jersey. All but Sinnickson had served in the Congress and Boudinot had been President of the Congress. Egbert Benson, William Floyd, John Hathorn, John Laurence, Peter Silvester, and Jeremiah Van Rensselaer, of New York, Benson had been a delegate to the Annapolis Convention, and he and Floyd and Laurence had served in the Congress, and Floyd had been a signer of the Declaration.

George Clymer, Thomas Fitzsimons, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Hiester, Frederick A. C. Muhlenberg, John Peter G. Muhlenberg, Thomas Scott, and Henry Wynkoop, of Pennsylvania. Clymer and Fitzsimons had both signed the Declaration and attended the Convention, and these two and Frederick A. C. Muhlenberg and Henry Wynkoop had served in the Congress. Aedanus Burke, Daniel Huger, William L. Smith, Thomas Sumter, and Thomas Tudor Tucker, of South Carolina. Huger and Tucker had both served in the Congress. Thedoric Bland, William B. Giles, John Brown, Isaac Coles, Richard Bland Lee, James Madison, Andrew Moore, John Page, Josiah Parker, Alexander White, and Samuel Griffin, of Virginia. Bland, Brown, and Madison had served in the Congress and Madison attended the Convention and is justly called the "Father of the Constitution."

Later from Rhode Island appeared Benjamin Bourn; and from North Carolina, John Baptista Ashe, Timothy Bloodworth, John Sevier, John Steele, and Hugh Williamson. Ashe, Bloodworth, and Williamson had served in the Congress.

The mere recital of the names of these Senators and Representatives, together with their legislative experience, speaks more eloquently of their character and ability than any prolonged statements of mine. While it is true that two Members of that Congress, Madison and Monroe, afterward attained the Presidency, and Gerry the Vice Presidency, and a number of others were Governors of their States, justices, and supreme court justices of their respective States, and one a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Ellsworth a Chief Justice of that Court; and although it is equally true that many had served in the legislative bodies of their several States prior to their election to the First Congress, and a number had helped frame the constitutions of their own States and had been members of State conventions which had ratified the Federal Constitution, it has been my thought to confine the record of their activities to their membership in the Continental Congress and attendance upon the Federal Convention, with the added participation on the part of some in the signing of the Declaration of Independence and the Articles of Confederation. These acts attesting their experience, ability, and service prior to the convening of the First Congress, of which they were Members. The one the legislative predecessor of the Congress, the other the author and creator of our congressional being, and another the declaration of our national rights, and still another the predecessor of our Constitution. Thus affording the present membership of the Congress a glimpse of the background, public service, and accomplishments, federally, of these legislative pioneers who, having thus ably served their time and country, have handed to us the torch of providing for the national safety of 130,000,000 of our fellow Americans and generations yet unborn.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

The situation was this: The conflicts and compromises of the Constitutional Convention were over. Hamilton, Madison, and Jay had spoken under the title of "The Federalist," and had made their marvelous contributions to the science of government in advocating the adoption of the Constitution. These articles had first been published in the Independent Gazetteer and then republished in many papers throughout the land.

The fundamental law had been ably explained. Eleven of the States had ratified and adopted the Constitution, some, it is true, with the qualification that a bill of rights would be added. The Continental Congress, now called the Congress of the Confederation, was rapidly coming to a close and was forever to end its session on March 2, 1789. The Articles of Confederation were soon to be a thing of the past.

The elections had been held, the Representatives and Senators in 11 States had been elected. George Washington had been elected President and John Adams Vice President.

The stage was set for the organization of our Government.

It should be a source of peculiar and justifiable pride to us that the legislative branch of our Government was the first to organize. The House had a quorum on April 1, 1789, and the Senate on April 6, 1789.

President Washington was not inaugurated until April 30 of that year, and the Supreme Court was not organized until February 2, 1790.

Thus the House of Representatives led the van.

THE TASK AHEAD

For the Members of the First Congress a great task was before them. No laws had been enacted; the Supreme Court had not yet been organized; there were no precedents to guide them, no illuminating opinions of the highest Court to throw light upon the disputed sections, clauses, phrases, and words of the Constitution. They had to chart their own course with only the compass of the Constitution to guide them. They had to create their own debates.

So much for their legislative difficulties, but there were other and greater obstacles to surmount. Those of raising revenue, paying the public debt, establishing a judiciary, creating the departments of government, providing for the common defense, fixing a permanent seat of government. These were but few of the problems that confronted them.

Probably the period from 1783 to 1787 was the darkest in our history. The Articles of Confederation were not finally adopted until March 2, 1781. This Congress of the Confederation could not levy any taxes, unless 9 out of the 13 States agreed. Bill after bill had been offered in the Congress to raise money to pay the interest on the national debt and to provide funds for the necessary expenses, only to fail, one after another.

The Congress called upon the States to raise $8,000,000 and only $400,000 was received. In the last 14 months of the Confederation it took in less than $400,000 and the interest on the foreign debt alone was over $2,400,000. It was said that the internal debt was over five times as large.

Shay's rebellion had occurred in Massachusetts. In The Constitution of the United States, Mr. Beck tells us that:

The officers of government and the courthouses were seized, jails were thrown open and prisoners released, the collection of debts was forbidden, and private property was forcibly appropriated to meet the common needs.

Therefore, the Members of the First Congress knew that they were not dealing with any theories, but that they were facing a serious situation that involved grave responsibilities. And it was their task to organize a practical system of government to cope with this situation. How well they succeeded we can all attest.

THEIR CONCEPTION OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT

What did the Members think of the Government they were about to legislate for in that First Congress; and what was their conception of the functions of that Government? In the House on June 18, 1789, Alexander White, of Virginia, said:

This is a Government constituted for particular purposes only; and the powers granted to carry it into effect are specifically enumerated and disposed among the various branches. If those powers are insufficient, or if they are improperly distributed, it is not our fault, or within our power to remedy. The people, who bestowed them, must grant further powers, organize those already granted, in a more perfect manner or suffer from the defect. We can neither enlarge nor modify this. This was the ground on which the friends of governments supported the Constitution. It was a safe ground, and I venture to say it could not have been supported on any other.

Again on that same day Fisher Ames, of Massachusetts, said in the House:

I appeal to that maxim which has the sanction of experience, and is authorized by the decision of the wisest men; to prevent an absence of power, it must be distributed into three branches who must be independent, to watch and check each other. The people are to watch them all. While these maxims are pursued our liberties shall be preserved.

These men had a clear conception of the limitations placed upon their legislative authority. It is quite true that they had the benefit of the presence and knowledge of many who had served in the Constitutional Convention, and thus had first-hand information of the proceedings of that Convention, but in this connection it must be remembered that Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, then a delegate to the Convention and a former Senator from that State, had suggested this addition to the rules of the Convention:

That the House provide * * * against licentious publications of their proceedings—and that James Madison was to jealously guard his notes of debate until his death many years later. So while, in one sense, they had a contemporaneous knowledge of the Convention and proceedings, in another, they had not, for with the exception of Luther Martins' The Genuine Information, 1788, being his report to the Maryland Legislature, nothing had been published, and in this report Martin complains bitterly about the secrecy of the Convention. Therefore, any knowledge that the Members were to acquire from the former delegates to the Convention depended in a very real sense on what those Members were willing to disclose.

In order that the Members may have an understanding of the first days of the Congress, the following entries are taken from the Journals of both Houses. It will be noted that the Senate sat with closed doors from April 6, 1789, until February 24, 1793.

These brief entries emphasize the difficulty of organizing due to the slowness of the Members in reporting. It was not until April 6 that a quorum was had in the Senate, and in the House a quorum was completed by the appearance of James Schureman, of New Jersey, and Thomas Scott, of Pennsylvania, on April 1.

On April 1 the House elected a Speaker and Clerk; on April 6 the Senate elected a President; and 2 days later, on April 8, a Secretary was elected.

It will be observed that it required a period of approximately 1 month before each body could be organized. The Members of the present Congress who fly from place to place by airplane, covering hundreds of miles in a few hours, and provided with every convenience for comfort and safety that the inventive genius of man can create, will do well to remember the hardships, dangers, and toils of our first brethren as they journeyed slowly to the new seat of government in New York City.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK, MARCH 4, 1789

Wednesday, March 4, 1789

This being the day fixed for the meeting of the new Congress, the following Members of the House of Representatives appeared and took their seats, viz:

From Massachusetts: George Thatcher, Fisher Ames, George Leonard, and Elbridge Gerry.

From Connecticut: Benjamin Huntington, Jonathan Trumbull, and Jeremiah Wadsworth.

From Pennsylvania: Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, Thomas Hartley, Peter Muhlenberg, and Daniel Heister.

From Virginia: Alexander White.

From South Carolina: Thomas Tudor Tucker.

A quorum of the Members not being present, the House adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock.

Thursday, March 5

Several other Members attended, viz: From New Hampshire, Nicholas Gilman; from Massachusetts, Benjamin Goodhue; from Connecticut, Roger Sherman and Jonathan Sturgis; and from Pennsylvania, Henry Wynkoop; and no other Members arriving, a quorum not being present, the House adjourned, from day to day, until the 14th instant.

Saturday, March 14

The following Members took their seats, to wit: James Madison, Jr., John Page, and Richard Bland Lee, from Virginia.

A quorum not being yet present, the House adjourned, from day to day, until the 17th instant.

Tuesday, March 17

Samuel Griffin, from Virginia, took his seat.

Monday, March 23

The following Members appeared, to wit: From New Jersey, Elias Boudinot; and from Maryland, William Smith. No additional Member appeared on the 24th.

Wednesday, March 25

Jonathan Parker, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

No additional Member arrived until the 30th instant.

Monday, March 30

George Gale, from Maryland, and Theodrick Bland, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats.

No additional Member on the 31st instant.

Wednesday, April 1

Two other Members appeared, to wit: James Schureman, from New Jersey, and Thomas Scott, from Pennsylvania, who forming a quorum of the whole body, it was, on motion,

Resolved, That this House will proceed to the choice of a Speaker by ballot.

The House accordingly proceeded to ballot for a Speaker, when it was found that a majority of the votes were in favor of Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, one of the Representatives from Pennsylvania. Whereupon Mr. Muhlenberg was conducted to the chair, from whence he made his acknowledgments to the House for so distinguished an honor.

The House then proceeded in the same manner to the appointment of a Clerk, when it was found that Mr. John Beckley was elected.

On motion,

Ordered, That the Members do severally deliver in their credentials at the Clerk's table.

Thursday, April 2

Lambert Cadwalader, from New Jersey, appeared and took his seat.

On motion,

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceedings as may be proper to be observed in this House. And the following Members were named on said committee, to wit: Messrs. Gilman, Gerry, Wadsworth, Boudinot, Hartley, Smith, Lee, Tucker, Madison, Sherman, and Goodhue.

Resolved, That a Doorkeeper and Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed for the service of this House.

On motion,

Ordered, That it be an instruction to the committee appointed to prepare and report such standing rules and orders of proceeding as may be proper to be observed in this House, that they also report the duty and services of a Sergeant at Arms or other proper officer for enforcing the orders of the House.

Friday, April 3

George Clymer, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat.

Saturday, April 4

George Partridge, from Massachusetts, appeared and took his seat.

Monday, April 6

Daniel Carroll, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a bill to regulate the taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution, and that Messrs. White, Madison, Trumbull, Gilman, and Cadwalader do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion,

Resolved, That the form of the oath to be taken by the Members of this House, as required by the third clause of the sixth article of the Constitution of the Government of the United States, be as followeth, to wit: "I, A B, a Representative of the United States in the Congress thereof, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be), in the presence of Almighty God, that I will support the Constitution of the United States. So help me God."

A message from the Senate by Mr. Ellsworth:

Mr. Speaker, I am charged by the Senate to inform this House that a quorum of the Senate is now formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States, in a choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in presence of this House, to discharge that duty. I have it also in further charge to inform this House that the Senate has appointed one of its Members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of this House to appoint one or more of its Members for the like purpose.

On motion,

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate, and that Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister be appointed on the part of this House to sit at the Clerk's table with the Member of the Senate and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared.

Mr. Speaker accordingly left the chair and, attended by the House, withdrew to the Senate Chamber, and after some time returned to the House.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister then delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of this House, which was ordered to be entered on the Journal.

On motion,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that it is the desire of this House that the notifications of the election of the President and Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons, and in such manner, as the Senate shall be pleased to direct; and that Mr. Madison do communicate the said message.

Tuesday, April 7

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the mayor of the city of New York, covering certain resolutions of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the said city, appropriating the City Hall for the accommodation of the general Government of the United States; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Boudinot, from the committee appointed to prepare such rules and orders of proceedings as may be proper to be observed in this House, made the following report:

"The committee to whom it was referred to prepare such standing rules and orders of proceeding as may be proper to be observed in this House, have, according to order, prepared the same and agreed to the following report:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the rules and orders following are proper to be established as the standing rules and orders of this House, to wit: * * *"

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK, MARCH 4, 1789

Wednesday, March 4, 1789

This being the day for the meeting of the new Congress, the following Members of the Senate appeared and took their seats:

From New Hampshire, John Langdon and Paine Wingate.

From Massachusetts, Caleb Strong.

From Connecticut, William S. Johnson and Oliver Ellsworth.

From Pennsylvania, William Maclay and Robert Morris.

From Georgia, William Few.

The members present not being a quorum, they adjourned from day to day, until

Wednesday, March 11

When the same members being present as on the 4th instant, it was agreed that a circular should be written to the absent Members, requesting their immediate attendance.

Thursday, March 12

No additional Members appearing, the Members present adjourned from day to day, until

Wednesday, March 18

When no additional Members appearing, it was agreed that another circular should be written to eight of the nearest absent Members, particularly desiring their attendance, in order to form a quorum.

Thursday, March 19

William Paterson, from New Jersey, appeared and took his seat.

Friday, March 20

No additional Member appeared.

Saturday, March 21

Richard Bassett, from Delaware, appeared and took his seat.

A sufficient number of Members to form a quorum not appearing, the Members present adjourned from day to day, until

Saturday, March 28

Jonathan Elmer, from New Jersey, appeared and took his seat.

No other Member appearing, an adjournment took place from day to day until—

Monday, April 6

Richard Henry Lee, from Virginia, then appearing, took his seat, and formed a quorum of the whole Senators of the United States.

The credentials of the Members present being read and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President, for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

John Langdon was elected.

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their Members to sit at the clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their Members for the like purpose.

Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message; and Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The Speaker and the Members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber, and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which were as follows:

Whereby it appeared that George Washington, Esq., was elected President and John Adams, Esq., Vice President, of the United States of America.

Mr. Madison, from the House of Representatives, thus addressed the Senate:

"Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and of the Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct."

And he withdrew.

Whereupon the Senate appointed Charles Thomson, Esq., to notify George Washington, Esq., of his election to the office of President of the United States of America, and Mr. Sylvanus Bourne to notify John Adams, Esq., of his election to the office of Vice President of the said United States.

A letter was received from James Duane, Esq., enclosing resolutions of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York tendering to Congress the use of the City Hall.

John Mathews was elected Doorkeeper.

Tuesday, April 7

Messrs. Ellsworth, Paterson, Maclay, Strong, Lee, Bassett, Few, and Wingate were appointed a committee to bring in a bill for organizing the judiciary of the United States.

Messrs. Ellsworth, Lee, Strong, Maclay, and Bassett were appointed a committee to prepare rules for the government of the two Houses in cases of conference, and to take under consideration the manner of electing Chaplains, and to confer thereupon with a committee of the House of Representatives.

The same committee was also to prepare rules for conducting the business of the Senate.

Wednesday, April 8

The Senate proceeded to ballot for a Secretary, and Samuel Alyné Otis, Esq., was elected.

Cornelius Maxwell was appointed messenger.

Thursday, April 9

Messrs. Langdon, Johnson, and Few were appointed a committee to make arrangements for receiving the President, and were empowered to confer with any committee of the House of Representatives that may be appointed for that purpose.

Monday, April 13

Ralph Izard, from South Carolina; Charles Carroll, from Maryland; and George Reed, from Delaware, appeared and took their seats.

The report of the committee to prepare rules for conducting the business of the Senate was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

Messrs. Johnson, Izard, and Maclay were appointed a committee to confer with any committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives upon the future disposition of the papers in the office of the late Secretary of Congress and report thereon.

The committee appointed to make arrangements for receiving the President were directed to settle the manner of receiving the Vice President also.

Mr. Carroll and Mr. Izard were added to the Judiciary Committee.

Tuesday, April 14

Tristram Dalton, from Massachusetts, appeared and took his seat.

A letter was written to the Mayor of the City of New York by the President of the Senate acknowledging the respect shown to the Government and accepting the offer made by him of the City Hall for the use of Congress.

The classification of the Senate on May 15, 1789, divided the Senate into three classes. The resolution reads as follows:

"That three papers of an equal size, numbered 1, 2, and 3, be, by the Secretary, rolled up and put into a box, and draws by Mr. Langdon, Mr. Wingate, and Mr. Dalton, in behalf of the respective classes, in which each of them are placed; and that the classes shall vacate their seats in the Senate according to the order of numbers drawn for them, beginning with No. 1.

"And that when Senators shall take their seats from States that have not yet appointed Senators, they shall be placed by lot in the foregoing classes, but in such manner as shall keep the classes as nearly equal as may be in numbers."

Monday, May 25

The Senate today for the first time entered upon executive business, having received from the President of the United States a communication covering a report from the Secretary of War, on the negotiations of the Governor of the Western Territory with certain northern and northwestern Indians, and the treaties made in consequence thereof at Fort Harmar on the 9th of January 1789, which was read, as follows: * * * and ordered to lie on the table.

POLITICAL SITUATION

The political parties were the Federalist and Anti-Federalist. The members, in the main, were members of these two parties. There were members who construed the Constitution broadly and those who construed it narrowly.

No better exposition of fundamental constitutional principles can be found anywhere than in the reports of these first congressional debates in the House of Representatives. As pointed out above, 10 of the Senators and 8 of the Representatives were among the 55 men who attended the Constitutional Convention. In addition, 19 of the Senators and 34 of the Members of the House had served in the Continental Congress under the Articles of Confederation. Also, it is to be noted that 5 Members of the Senate and 26 Members of the House had been members of the respective State conventions which had ratified the Constitution. Therefore they were perfectly familiar with the best parliamentary practices of the day. They came to the First Congress well equipped to perform the duties of their office.

Is it any wonder that it has been said that the "First Congress was almost an adjourned session of the Federal Convention?"

The constitutionality of almost every important bill was attacked. When we reflect upon this fact it does not seem so unnatural. Here was a new form of government, unorganized, with only the fundamental principles of the Constitution before the Members of the Congress. The Members of that First Congress had to make that Government work, and in order to do this they had to translate the principles of the Constitution into effective legislation which would stand the acid test of constitutionality.

It was one thing to draft the Constitution, it was quite another to make it work; and this latter task was the work of the First Congress, and how well they performed that task should be a matter of pride to every succeeding Member of the Congress.

In the first session of this Congress the first great constitutional debate was over the question whether the power of removal was vested in the President by the Constitution. Among those who took part in this debate were Theodor Bland, John Page, Alexander White, James Jackson, James Madison, John Vining, Fisher Ames, John Laurence, William Smith, Elbridge Gerry, Peter Sylvester, and Abraham Baldwin. This debate lasted for many days, and in Parsons v. United States (167 U. S. 324, 329) Justice Peckman describes it as follows:

Then ensued what has been many times described as one of the ablest constitutional debates which has taken place in Congress since the adoption of the Constitution.

In the second session of the First Congress another great debate arose over the constitutionality of the bill which provided for the fixing of the seat of government. The point of issue was that this was an infringement on the power of each Congress by joint resolution to fix the place to which it would adjourn.

Another famous debate was that which occurred in the third session on the charter of the Bank of the United States. In this discussion the meaning of the "general welfare" and "necessary and proper" clauses of the Constitution were discussed at great length. This was a veritable Roman holiday for the Federalists and anti-Federalists, the strict constructionists and loose constructionists. It is interesting to note that this debate, which got under way on February 1, 1791, was still going strong on February 7. The bill became a law on February 25, 1791, when President Washington, having disregarded the advice of Thomas Jefferson and Attorney General Randolph, accepted that of Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton and signed the bill on February 24, 1791.

THE WORK OF THE CONGRESS

Scarcely had the preliminaries of organization been settled, the rules adopted, the committees appointed, and the bill for organizing the judiciary introduced, and the other matters of vital importance settled, when on June 8, 1789, James Madison introduced into the House the proposed amendments to the Constitution.

On April 7 the Senate appointed a committee to bring in a bill for organizing the judiciary of the United States, consisting of Messrs. Ellsworth, Paterson, Maclay, Strong, Lee, Bassett, Few, and Wingate. However, it was not until June 12 that Mr. Lee, in behalf of the committee, reported the bill and it did not pass the Senate until July 17, 1789, and on that day was referred to the House, and on September 17 it passed the House, and on the 24th of that month was approved by the President.

While undoubtedly this was a matter of first importance, yet the speed with which Madison introduced the proposed amendments indicates the importance attached to their being submitted to the people and the States at an early date.

It is interesting, indeed, to realize that the man who had so much to do with the framing of the Constitution was now to take an active part in being among the first to amend it; and in this same Congress assist in interpreting and administering it; and later, as President, in executing its provisions. Surely his was a well-rounded constitutional experience, and we today are the heirs and joint heirs of a marvelous legacy bequeathed to us by that great student of statecraft.

In this connection it will be recalled that, notably in Massachusetts and Virginia, the conventions called for the purpose of ratifying the Constitution had refused to ratify it until assurances had been given that a bill of rights would be added to the Constitution. On December 20, 1787, after the close of the convention, Thomas Jefferson had written to Madison in part as follows:

A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular.

In the State of New York there was also a most determined opposition. And in the setting up of a frame of government for the Nation there had been an insistent demand from every section of the country for a national bill of rights.

In accordance with this demand Madison introduced the proposed amendments to the Constitution embodying a bill of rights. Some time before this George Wythe had prepared a compilation of rights for the Virginia Convention, and from this list and the bills of rights in seven other State constitutions the ones submitted had been taken.

Four of these existed in the constitution of every State, to wit: Freedom of religion, freedom of the press, trial by jury, and the guaranty against being deprived of life, liberty, and property except by the law of the land; but not all of these were to be found in the bill of rights of any one State.

It is very interesting to observe that one of the rights most discussed today, viz, freedom of speech, was included in the first amendment and created by it. In his work on popular lawmaking, page 302, Frederic J. Stimson states:

It should be noted, however, that the broad principle of freedom of speech by all persons and at all places is first adopted in the American Constitution; freedom of speech in England in its historical principles extending only to freedom of speech in the House of Parliament and the right of assembly and petition at a public meeting.

Had the First Congress done no other work than this, it would have earned the lasting gratitude of all succeeding generations for having enacted the legislation which submitted these proposed amendments to the States for ratification and the subsequent adoption of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution.

Many of the statements made by Madison in introducing the proposed amendments could well be repeated here, but lack of space forbids, however, a few excerpts taken from his speech will suffice:

And I do most sincerely believe that if Congress will devote but 1 day to this subject, so far as to satisfy the public that we do not disregard their wishes, it will have a salutary influence on the public councils, and prepare the way for a favorable reception of our future measures. It appears to me that the House is bound by every motive of prudence not to let the first session pass over without proposing to the State legislatures, some things to be incorporated into the Constitution, that will render it as acceptable to the whole people of the United States as it has been found acceptable to a majority of them. * * * but I believe that the great mass of people who opposed it, disliked it because it did not contain effectual provisions against the encroachment on particular rights, and those safeguards which they have been long accustomed to have interposed between them and the magistrate who exercises the sovereign power. * * * That the people have an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform or change their Government, whenever it be found adverse or inadequate to the purposes of its institution.

The following is most interesting:

Eightly. That immediately after article 6 be inserted, as article 7, the clauses following, to wit: "The powers delegated by this Constitution are appropriated to the department to which they are respectively distributed, so that the legislative department shall never exercise the powers vested in the executive or judicial, nor the executive exercise the powers vested in the legislative or judicial, nor the judicial exercise the powers vested in the legislative or executive departments." * * *

Even a great statesman can be wrong occasionally, as witnessed by the following:

In our Government it is, perhaps, less necessary to guard against the abuse in the executive department than any other; because it is not the stronger branch of the system but the weaker.

However, in the following statement much comfort may be found.

If they are incorporated into the Constitution, independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the legislative or executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the Constitution by the Declaration of Rights.

Surely the opinions and decisions of a free and independent judiciary over the period of a century and a half have verified the prophetic utterances of this far-seeing man.

As indicated above the first task was to raise a revenue sufficient for the support of the new government. It was estimated that the Government would require at least $600,000 a year to pay its ordinary expenses, and an additional sum would be required to pay the interest on the public debt.

On July 4, 1789, the second act passed by Congress was approved. It is stated in the preamble of this act that it was—Necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

A Tonnage Act was also passed, by which foreign vessels bringing goods into the United States were to pay a duty of 50 cents a ton, while American vessels were only to pay 6 cents a ton. These two acts went into effect in August 1789, and in a short time the Government had sufficient means with which to carry on its affairs.

The next step was to create these executive departments, to wit: The Department of Foreign Affairs, the Treasury Department, and the Department of War.

The special act, referred to above, conferring the power of removal alone on the President was soon passed. The debate on the bill consumed nearly a week's time.

On September 24, 1789, the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States was approved. Students of legal lore will recall the battles which were to follow over certain sections of this act which was almost entirely the creation of Oliver Ellsworth.

First, in Marbury v. Madison (February term, 1803, 1 Cranch 137), the last subsection of section 13 of the act was declared unconstitutional by Chief Justice Marshall. The story of this famous case is too long and too well known to be here repeated.

Then there is the all-important section 25 of this act in which the Supreme Court was given jurisdiction on writ of error, of cases coming from State courts in which were involved decisions adverse to the validity of acts of Congress, and by the provisions of this section the Supreme Court is given express power to "reverse or affirm" the decision of the State court. And as pointed out by Charles W. Warren in his work, Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court:

Power to affirm necessarily implied power to hold the act of Congress unconstitutional, since the State-court decision so affirmed, would have made that holding.

These are but few of the many important acts passed in the three sessions of the First Congress.

PUBLIC DEBT

Very soon after the second session began, January 4, 1790, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance to the provisions of a resolution passed by the House at the first session, submitted a report on the national debt. The report shows that the domestic debt amounted to $42,414,085, and the foreign debt to $11,710,378. The total State debt incurred during the Revolutionary War was estimated at $25,000,000. Hamilton's plan to pay these debts was that the Federal Government should assume the whole amount of the indebtedness owed by the States, and that the Government should assume and fund the whole national debt. These debts were to be paid by the surplus revenue from the duties on imports and the moneys derived from the sale of the public lands, and so forth.

The assumption of these State debts was looked on with favor by the Representatives from the Eastern and Middle States, but most of the Members from the Southern States opposed this. To trace the history of the legislation through the pages of the annals in its intertwining with the bill to locate the permanent seat of government is one of the most interesting and intriguing things that a student of legislative history can do. After some real "legislative bargaining" the funding bill was passed and on June 28, 1790, a bill was presented to the Senate to locate the permanent seat of the government in a district not exceeding 10 miles square "on the river Patomac, at some space between the mouths of the Eastern Branch and Conococheague." The act for establishing the permanent seat of the Federal Government was finally passed on July 9, 1790, during the second session.

BIOGRAPHIES OF THE OFFICERS

As stated above John Langdon, of New Hampshire, was elected President pro tempore of the Senate, and Samuel A. Otis, of Massachusetts, Secretary.

In the House Frederick Augustus Conrad Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, was elected Speaker, and John Beckley, of Virginia, Clerk.

The outline biographies of the first three named are as follows:

John Langdon, a Delegate and a Senator from New Hampshire, born in Portsmouth, N. H., June 25, 1741; attended the school of Major Hale in Portsmouth; engaged in mercantile pursuits; prominent in pre-Revolutionary affairs and during the war; a representative in the General Court; Member of the Continental Congress in 1775 and 1778; resigned in June 1778 to become Navy agent, and superintended the construction of several ships of war; served several terms as speaker of the State House of Representatives, and during the session of 1777 staked his fortune to equip Gen. John Stark's brigade; participated in the Battle of Bennington and commanded a company at Saratoga and in Rhode Island; again a Member of the Continental Congress in 1783; President of New Hampshire in 1785; delegate to Federal Constitutional Convention in 1787; Governor of New Hampshire in 1788, 1805, and 1809-11; elected as a Democrat to the United States Senate and served from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1801; elected the first President pro tempore of the Senate on April 6, 1789, in order that the Senate might organize to count the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States; declined to accept the portfolio of Secretary of the Navy in the Cabinet of President Madison in 1811 and the Democratic nomination as a candidate for Vice President in 1812; died in Portsmouth, N. H., September 18, 1819; interment in the Langdon tomb in North Cemetery.

Samuel Allyne Otis, born in Barnstable, Barnstable County, Mass., November 24, 1740; was graduated from Harvard College in 1759; engaged in mercantile pursuits in Boston; member of the Board of War in 1776; collector of clothing for the Continental Army in 1777; member of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention which framed the constitution of that State; again a member of the State house of representatives, 1784-87, and was elected speaker of the house in 1784; member of the Continental Congress in 1787 and 1788; elected Secretary of the United States Senate on April 8, 1789, and served in that capacity until his death in Washington, D. C., April 22, 1814; interment in Congressional Cemetery.

Frederick Augustus Conrad Muhlenberg, a Delegate and Representative from Pennsylvania; born in Trappe, Pa., January 1, 1750; pursued an academic course; attended the University of Halle, Germany; studied theology and was ordained by the ministerium of Pennsylvania a minister of the Lutheran Church, October 25, 1770; preached in Stouchsburg and Lebanon, Pa., 1770-74, and in New York City, 1774-76; when the British entered New York he felt obliged to leave and returned to Trappe, Pa., moved to New Hanover, Pa., and was pastor of Lutheran congregations there and in Oley and New Goshenhoppen until August, 1779; Member of the Continental Congress in 1779 and 1780; served in the State house of representatives, 1780-83, and was elected speaker November 3, 1780; delegate to and president of the State Constitutional Convention in 1787, called to ratify the Federal Constitution; elected to the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Congresses (March 4, 1789-March 3, 1797); served as Speaker during the First and Third Congresses; was not a candidate for renomination in 1796; president of the council of censors of Pennsylvania; appointed receiver general of the Pennsylvania Land Office on January 8, 1800, and served until his death in Lancaster, Pa., June 5, 1801; interment in the Woodward Hill Cemetery.

John Beckley, the clerk, was born in Virginia. His full name was John James, and he thus subscribed himself as a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society of the College of William and Mary in 1776. He was at various times clerk of the House of Delegates and of the Senate of Virginia. He was also secretary of the Virginia Convention called to ratify the Constitution. As the first Clerk of the House of Representatives he served from April 1, 1789, to May 15, 1797, and again from December 7, 1801, to October 26, 1807. In the period from 1802 to 1807 he served as the first Librarian of Congress.

CUSTOMS AND HABITS

The daily sessions of both Houses were conducted in a very formal manner. Behind their closed doors the Senate conducted its proceedings in a very decorous manner. Most of the Senators were handsomely attired and moved about with considerable dignity. The Representatives, likewise well dressed and in their carefully powdered wigs, attracted a great deal of attention, especially as their sessions were open to the public. The House had the more eloquent orators and the better debaters.

Senate, April 30, 1789: The President, the Vice President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, etc., then proceeded to St. Paul's Chapel, where divine service was performed by the Chaplain of Congress, after which the President was reconducted to his house by the committee appointed for that purpose.

The Vice President and Senate returned to the Senate Chamber, and, Upon motion, unanimously agreed, that a committee of three should be appointed to prepare an answer to the President's speech, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Paterson, and Mr. Carroll were elected.

Wednesday, June 2, 1790: On motion of Mr. Gerry, Resolved unanimously, That the Members of the House, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory thereof, will go in mourning for him 1 month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape around the life arm.

Thursday, February 24, 1791: It was moved that the Senate agree to the following resolutions, to wit: Resolved, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open whilst the Senate shall be sitting in a legislative capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule shall commence and be in force on the first day of the next session of Congress.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate request the Commissioners of the city and county of Philadelphia to cause a proper gallery to be erected for the accommodation of an audience.

In a Philadelphia newspaper of 1791 is this statement:

In a very plain chair without canopy, and with a small mahogany table before him, festooned at the sides and front with green silk, Mr. Adams, the Vice President, presides as President of the Senate. Among the Senators is observed constantly during the debates the most beautiful silence, the most beautiful order, gravity, and personal dignity of manner. They all appear every morning full powdered and dressed in the richest material. The very atmosphere of the Chamber seems to inspire wisdom, mildness, and condescension. Should any of the Senators so far forget for a moment as to be the cause of a protracted whisper while another was addressing the Vice President, three gentle raps with his silver pencil case by Mr. Adams immediately restored everything to repose and the most respectful attention.

The Senators in their courtesy present a most striking contrast to the independent loquacity of the Representatives below stairs, most of whom persist in wearing, while in their seats and during the debates their ample cocked hats, placed "fore and aft" upon their heads.

The Members' compensation was $6 per day for each day's actual attendance in Congress, and $6 for every 20 miles traveled in going to or returning from a session.

The President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House were each allowed $12 a day.

The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House each received $1,500 per year as salary, and in addition $2 for each day of the session.

The Sergeant at Arms received $3 a day and the Door-keeper $750 a year.

The debates of the House were reported by shorthand writers and printed in the Congressional Register. This was an unofficial publication. The newspaper reporters were allowed on the floor of the House, and had seats in front of the Speaker's platform. Many complaints were made by the Members about the published reports to the effect that they were "glaring deviations from the truth." Even in those early days the Members were being "misquoted." Finally a motion was made to prohibit the publication of reports. After a long discussion it was withdrawn, "with the hope that the reporters and printers would be more courteous in the future as to their publications, and study a greater degree of accuracy and impartiality."

The Senators had no trouble of this nature for the three-fold reason that they sat behind closed doors and no reports of the debates were permitted to be printed, and they excluded everyone, even Representatives, from their Chamber.

ACTS AND RESOLUTIONS

The acts and resolutions of the First Congress were as follows:

First session, March 4, 1789, to September 29, 1789: Twenty-five acts, no concurrent resolutions.

Second session, January 4, 1790, to August 12, 1790: Forty-one acts and two concurrent resolutions.

Third session, December 6, 1790, to March 3, 1791: Twenty-eight acts and one concurrent resolution.

The first act passed was on June 1, 1789, being an act providing for the form of oath or affirmation required by the sixth article of the Constitution.

The last act was one entitled "An act for raising and adding another regiment to the Military Establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers." This was approved March 3, 1791.

PUBLIC SERVICES OF THE MEMBERS

In the assemblage of the First Congress 48 of the Members thereof were lawyers, 42 were college graduates and 51 of them had fought in either the Indian or Revolutionary Wars.

Brief excerpts from the lives of a number of the Members will suffice to prove the widespread diversity of their activities and the character of their public services.

Oliver Ellsworth, as stated, was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, March 4, 1796.

William Samuel Johnson was president of Columbia College (University) from 1787 to 1800.

Roger Sherman has the honor of having signed all four of the great state papers, the Declaration of 1774, the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution.

Richard Bassett, who attended the original Annapolis convention, was the first to cast his vote to locate the Capital on the Potomac.

Daniel Carroll was the owner of the farm which is the present site of the city of Washington.

William Smith was the first auditor of the United States Treasury.

Elbridge Gerry, as stated, was elected Vice President in 1812, and the term "gerrymandering" is taken from his name and the shape of a rearranged voting district.

William Paterson was Senator from New Jersey, 1790; Governor of that State, 1790-93, and Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1793, all within the space of 4 years.

Philemon Dickinson graduated in the first class to emerge from the University of Pennsylvania.

Elias Boudinot had been President of the Continental Congress, 1782-83, and signed the treaty of peace with England; first president of the American Bible Society.

Rufus King was Minister to Great Britain from 1796 to 1803, and again from May 1825 to June 1826.

Philip Schuyler was one of the four major generals in the Continental Army in 1775 at the outbreak of the Revolutionary War.

Egbert Benson was one of the three commissioners appointed to direct the embarkation of the Tory refugees for the loyal British provinces.

Benjamin Hawkins left the senior class of Princeton to be on the staff of General Washington as interpreter in French.

Timothy Bloodworth was employed in making muskets and bayonets for the Continental Army, and later commissioner of confiscated property.

John Steele, appointed Comptroller of the Treasury in 1796; reappointed by both Presidents Adams and Jefferson.

George Clymer, one of the commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Cherokee and Creek Indian Tribes in 1796.

John Henry studied law in the Temple, London; was a member of the committee to prepare the ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory.

Fisher Ames, chosen president of Harvard University in 1804, but declined to accept on account of ill health.

Jonathan Grant served in the expedition against Canada, 1757-60; served in the Revolutionary War.

Theodore Sedgwick studied theology and law; speaker of the State house of representatives, Speaker of the Sixth Congress, elected President pro tempore of the Senate 1798.

Jonathan Trumbull, appointed secretary and first aide-de-camp to General Washington in 1780, served as Speaker of the Second Congress.

Abraham Baldwin, chaplain in Revolutionary Army, 1777-83; admitted to the bar; president of the University of Georgia; elected President pro tempore of the Senate, 1801.

John Sevier, elected Governor of "the proclaimed" State of Franklin, and served for 3 years.

John Peter Gabriel Muhlenberg, a brother of the Speaker. This is the only instance of brothers serving in the First Congress. Pastor of Lutheran Churches, ordained in the Episcopal Church, brigadier general in the Continental Army.

Thomas Tudor Tucker, appointed United States Treasurer by President Jefferson in 1801.

Alexander White, appointed by President Washington as one of the three commissioners to lay out the city of Washington.

William Maclay, a surveyor in the employ of the Penn family in 1760, author of journal from which sketches in debate in the United States Senate, 1789-91, is taken.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton attended the Jesuits' College of Bohemia, at Herman's Manor, Md., and the College of St. Omer in France; studied civil law at the College of Louis

Le Grand in Rheims and the common law at Temple in London; set the stone marking the beginning of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad July 4, 1828; at the time of his death he was the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence. He thus becomes the link between the past and the present in the long journey of advancing progress and speed in transportation from the day of the blazed trail, the birchbark canoe, the sailing vessel to the present high-speed, stream-lined, luxurious trains of the modern railroad.

Jeremiah Wadsworth, commissary general during the Revolutionary War was the great-great-uncle of Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, a Member of this House.

Theodoric Bland, studied medicine in Edinburgh, captain in the Continental Army, was a relative of Schuyler Otis Bland, also a Member of the present House.

John Page, a graduate of William and Mary College, colonel in the Revolutionary Army, Governor of Virginia, was an ancestor of William Tyler Page, special clerk to the minority in the present session.

SESSION CLOSED

Thursday, March 3, 1791

The business of the session being gone through, on motion: Resolved, That the thanks of the House of Representatives of the United States be presented to Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the chair, and in the execution of the difficult and important trust imposed in him as Speaker of said House.

It was resolved unanimously; whereupon Mr. Speaker made his acknowledgments to the House in manner following:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, this unexpected mark of your approbation of my conduct has made so deep an impression on my mind that I cannot find words to express the high sense of gratitude I entertain on this occasion.

"I have not vanity sufficient to suppose that my feeble, though well-meant endeavors merit so great a reward; for it was your kind indulgence and support alone which enabled me to go through the duties of the station which you were pleased to assign me; but I shall ever consider this distinguished and honorable testimony as the most fortunate circumstance of my life.

"Gentlemen, I most sincerely thank you. May every possible happiness attend you and every individual of this body, and may your zealous endeavors, which I have so long and so often been a witness to be crowned with unbounded success."

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are now to adjourn without a day, and that the Clerk of this House do go with said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message, and being returned,

A message was received from the Senate, notifying that the Senate, having completed the legislative business before them, are now about to adjourn; whereupon

Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without a day.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] such time as he may desire.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the consideration of this bill, which increases our national defenses, affords me an appropriate opportunity to submit some views which have long been on my mind in respect to war and how to keep out of it.

This is a time when every citizen of the Republic ought to be making a calm and dispassionate survey of the international situation to try to determine whither we are drifting. In a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" these are questions that the people should take home to themselves for discussion in their family circles and by their firesides. If war comes, they will have to do the fighting and the dying. They and their children will have to bend their backs to a century of grinding toil to pay the staggering costs of war. And if war should fasten a dictatorship upon our country, they and their children and their children's children, down to the remotest generation, will mourn the loss of the rights and liberties now guaranteed to us under the Bill of Rights, which are more precious than life itself and which go to make up the inestimable franchise of freedom.

It is a time when all of our people, civilians no less than our public officials, should be discussing these questions of foreign relations in the light of the realism that confronts us, free from rancor, in a spirit of the broadest catholicity, to the end that amid the increasing world confusion and hysteria we may find the road to peace and may chart a course of wise national action that will guarantee the maintenance and perpetuity of our beloved, free institutions.

TIME TO THINK AND PRAY

If such a thing were possible, at this crisis in the world's history, with meaningful portents blackening the skies and with every false move pregnant with possibilities of harm to America, I would like to see all of our people brought together in thought and prayer in order that we may profit by the counsel of mutual understanding and reason. I would like to see these vital problems lifted out of the realm of diplomatic maneuvering and secret diplomacy and submitted for decision to the combined judgment and conscience of America, because I share with Jefferson his faith in the people and the righteousness of their ultimate conclusions, and I believe with Wilson in "open covenants openly arrived at."

I would like to see a broader recognition of the principle of democracy in dealing with these grave questions of international import, because I believe with the utmost sincerity that we will get rid of war, and the threats and dangers of war, as we build up our democracy. That is the reason why I have reintroduced my proposed amendment to the Constitution which would give to the people, with women having equal voting privileges with men, the right to decide whether our boys shall be sent to some distant part of the globe to fight and perhaps to die in a foreign war. It is a democratic principle that those who have to do the fighting and the dying and to bear the inexpressible burdens and griefs of war should have something to say as to whether we shall depart from our defensive program and enter wars that are being waged across the seas.

I have observed what seems to me to be a very deplorable tendency among those who entertain divergent views on foreign policy to criticize those holding opinions contrary to their own, and sometimes we have ugly outbreaks of criminations and recriminations that never should occur, because, after all, it is our common problem, and we should approach it with mutual respect for one another. The issues before us are among the most serious that have ever confronted our country, and we should be willing to sit down and reason together, everyone conceding to those who dissent from his views the good faith and patriotic purpose that he claims for himself. The observations I shall make today certainly will not be intended as a criticism, direct or implied, of any official of the Government or anyone else, but rather as a submission of some ideas that have occurred to me in long and thoughtful consideration of America's problems in relation to a distraught world, and these ideas are presented in the hope that they will prove in some degree helpful and constructive.

GENERAL HARRISON'S WISE ADVICE

When I was a lad, long before I had reached my majority, I was a writer on an Indianapolis newspaper and was Indiana correspondent for the New York World. At that particular time the papers were headlined with news about some foreign imbroglio—the mists of years have erased from my memory its nature and extent—and one day the World telegraphed instructions to me to see Benjamin Harrison, the twenty-third President of the United States, and to get from him an expression as to whether or not he thought the United States should intervene with armed forces. That was a tough assignment, especially for a beardless boy, as General Harrison was proverbially hard to interview. I set about the task with very conscious misgivings, fully aware that even if he should break over his reserve and make a statement it probably would not consume as much space as the World would like, as I had never known of anyone who equaled General Harrison's faculty of expressing much meaning in few words.

I found him at his home on North Delaware Street, in the city I now represent in Congress, and with fear and trembling I handed to him the telegram the World had sent to me and asked him to comment on it. At this point I want to say that I never knew a man who had more sheer strength of character than General Harrison. He was austere to a fault, but sincere and true; a Christian with the highest ideals of living and service. He read the telegram carefully and his face was illumined with the earnestness of his convictions as he replied in a breath-taking sentence of 10 words:

We have no commission from God to police the world.

His words ring in my ears today just as they did over 40 years ago. I have often thought how his striking aphorism supplements General Washington's Farewell Address, in which the Father of his Country admonished posterity to cultivate friendly relations with all nations and entangling alliances with none, and how those two great Americans, Washington and Harrison, have handed down a philosophy which, if we follow it, will keep our country free and independent and respected among the nations of the earth.

TIRADES ONLY ROCK THE BOAT

I thought of General Harrison's advice when I voted the other day against the establishment of a naval outpost at Guam, far beyond the zone of our continental defense and 6,000 miles from the shores of the United States, and I think of it every time one of our Cabinet ministers or leading Senators, charged with committee responsibilities, associated with foreign affairs, breaks loose and fulminates bitter invectives against rulers of foreign governments. I certainly hope that such tirades will stop. Those who engage in them render America a distinct disservice. We abhor the dictators for their high crimes and misdemeanors, and we loathe them for their flagrant disregard for the humanities, but we are not the Supreme Ruler of the universe, and, as General Harrison said, "We have no commission from God to police the world."

I speak as one who believes in strong national defense. I believe that a combination consisting of adequate national defense coupled with a referendum on foreign wars is the very best peace insurance this country could have. I voted for the naval expansion bill and for the military expansion bill and for the bill for improving the naval bases after the item for Guam was eliminated. But the kind of defense I have voted for—and the only kind I will vote for—is home defense for the protection of our homeland and for carrying out our obligations under the Monroe Doctrine.

MONROE DOCTRINE HAS TWO SIDES

We have declared in the Monroe Doctrine that foreign nations must keep off of the Americas, but some of our Cabinet leaders and senatorial statesmen seem to forget that the doctrine should work both ways; that is to say, if it is logical and proper to say to foreign nations that they shall not interfere in the Americas it is logical and proper for foreign nations to say that we shall not interfere in their affairs. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

If a foreign country wants to set up a certain ideology within its own boundaries, we may feel sorry for it, but I cannot see that it is any of our business so long as in doing so they do not interfere with us. Ideologies foreign to our hopes and aspirations have been in existence in many countries ever since the American Nation was born, but we have kept the peace with such countries however unsympathetic we have been to their alien ideals. Russia under the czars, with their unconscionable repressive measures and repeated "liquidations" of patriots in whose breasts the fire of liberty burned with an unquenchable flame, certainly did not conform in any way to our conceptions of freedom and justice, but we accepted the situation in Russia as one over which we had no control and we did not declaim against the czarist ideology.

WE SHOULD AVOID HYSTERIA

In the present state of world affairs there are some things we should do and some things we should just as scrupulously refrain from doing. One thing we should do is to build up our defenses in a sane, logical way to afford permanent protection to America, whatever may be the stress from the outside. One thing we should not do is to give way to hysteria.

We have been manifesting hysterical symptoms wholly unwarranted and which may convey to the world the unjustified impression that we are afraid of something. If there is any nation on earth that has given the slightest sign or indication of an intention to attack us, I am unaware of that fact. Will someone tell me what country has raised a finger against us?

An egomaniac like Hitler must smile whenever he turns on the radio and hears a short-wave broadcast by some American Cabinet minister or Senator blasting him ferociously. I fear that we are tickling his vanity by magnifying him far beyond his importance.

One thing we need to do, from the national-defense standpoint, if none other, is to build up our economic stability at home. There are various kinds of preparedness and no nation is well prepared unless its economic position is sound. Germany, specializing on airplanes, has built up a great and formidable offense machinery, but American experts tell me that one reason they do not greatly fear Germany is that they believe she is on the verge of an economic collapse.

TWO ADMINISTRATION MOVES THAT PLEASE

I have been immensely pleased by two moves our national administration has made lately. I refer first to its so-called "appeasement" attitude toward business and, secondly, to the President's effort to bring the warring factions of labor together in a harmonious agreement. I think both of these moves might well have been made long ago. It has been apparent for years that the honest businessman was "the forgotten man" in our national equation. While apparently everybody else has been brought within the scope of the administration's humanitarian program he has been left out in the cold. What labor wants and needs is permanent jobs under good working conditions and at a saving wage, but we have overlooked the fact that this objective cannot be attained unless there is someone with capital in a position to give those jobs.

We have kicked the businessman all around the lot, penalizing him with discriminatory taxation and excessive regimentation until he is groggy and ready to throw up his hands in despair. The administration is now acting wisely when it tries to help the businessman and to bring peace in the labor world. If it succeeds—and there is no reason why it should not succeed—it will incalculably strengthen our national defense by building up a strong, happy, contented Nation. And while we are making our economic position impregnable we should recognize the importance of a moral rearmament as well, and should shape our conduct to conform to our traditional role of good neighbor to the world.

KINDNESS A GREATER FORCE THAN CANNON

There are many things kindness will do that cannot be done with cannon. Let us suppose a hypothetical case. Let us suppose some awful plague should visit Germany, threatening the lives of hundreds of thousands of their little children and suppose that we should appropriate the equivalent of the cost of one or two battleships and send the money over to Germany with our best wishes as a gift to be used in combating that plague. Does anyone think that, having done that, we would need to build any battleships to fight Germany? Oh, it seems to me strange that in a country that professes Christianity, some of our statesmen do not think now and then of the advisability of tackling some of these problems on the Christian front!

A SIX-POINT PROGRAM

I would reduce these perhaps too rambling thoughts to the following summation:

- (1) That we should keep our heads and not get hysterical.
- (2) That we should build up our national defense along sound constructive lines for home defense only.
- (3) That we should scrupulously keep out of all foreign entanglements and give up every idea we ever have had of policing the world.
- (4) That we should open the way to provide a greater opportunity for the American people to become acquainted with our international problems and to act with more authority in matters affecting international relations, and especially in respect to the exercise of the war power.

(5) That we should do everything possible to improve our economic situation at home and to make America a happy, prosperous Nation.

(6) That we should build up our moral rearmament and studiously seek to find ways to be a good neighbor to all the people of the world.

This is my six-point program. With the modesty of one who seeks to walk humbly but at the same time with confidence in the righteousness of this program, I commend it to my beloved colleagues, believing that herein lies our best prospect for future security and our greatest hope for deliverance from evil. [Applause.]

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I note on page 14 of the report of the committee on the bill under consideration the following language:

On page 8 of the bill provision is made for placing educational orders to familiarize manufacturing establishments with the production of munitions of war of special or technical design.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose in asking time from the Committee today is to call attention to H. R. 4429, wherein the Commodity Credit Corporation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to acquire title to 4,000,000 bales of cotton now held as security for loans advanced by this Corporation, such cotton to be transferred to the War Department to be held as munitions of war, and for other military purposes.

Of course, the primary purpose of the bill is to provide a sufficient and necessary reserve as a munition in case of war. The secondary purpose is to remove from the market or take from the channels of trade a considerable portion of the surplus cotton now held as security for loans advanced to farmers by the Federal Government.

We would like to submit, at the outset, that the principle on which this legislation is based is fundamentally sound and in keeping with the policy practiced by our Government almost from the beginning. It is in keeping with the long-established practice of preparing for war in time of peace by maintaining and keeping on hand a supply of munitions in reserve. Our Government has done this for many years, although it has not been the policy to keep in reserve a supply of cotton, even though it is considered absolutely necessary and indispensable in time of war. Congress evidently plans to make all preparations necessary for adequate defense. We have already provided for 6,000 airplanes and made a $50,000,000 appropriation for strengthening our Navy, and it is proposed to authorize the War Department to purchase millions of dollars worth of war materials from foreign countries and hold such materials in reserve.

However, it appears that the necessity for a reserve amount of cotton has been overlooked, for in these more modern days cotton is recognized by military experts as essential as any other munition in waging or carrying on a successful war. For the past three-quarters of a century cotton has been looked upon in time of war very much in the same way as guns, explosives, and other munitions, and in more recent years cotton has been declared a contraband of war just as much so as the most high-powered explosives. In support of this statement I wish to quote an interview with Viscount Milner reported in the New York Times August 21, 1915, which is as follows:

"You ask me," says Lord Milner, "whether the declaration of cotton as contraband is justified. I am not a lawyer, but I should have thought it was quite clear that any of the belligerents nowadays was entitled to declare cotton as contraband. Lists of contraband articles vary necessarily with every war, but the broad principle is clear enough. Anything may be declared contraband which is essential to a belligerent for the continuance of the war. It is quite true that considerable doubt has existed until this war as to whether cotton comes within the category. But the present war has shown that the successful conduct of military operations requires an enormous consumption of munitions of all kinds, and since cotton is the basis of almost all propulsive explosives in actual use, vast quantities of cotton have to be employed and are in fact indispensable to a belligerent. In short, cotton is now just as essential a part of munitions of war as were in the old days the component parts of gunpowder or the raw materials from which ships or cannon were made."

To show that cotton was indispensable and was used as a munition to a very great extent in the last World War, I desire to quote from a report furnished by the Bureau of the Census showing the quantity of cotton fiber used in the manufacture of explosives alone. I quote:

The demand for guncotton, smokeless powder, and absorbent cotton to meet the needs of the warring nations has been such as to affect the cotton situation appreciably. Importance of reliable information as to the quantity of fiber consumed in the manufacture of these products led Congress to make provision for the collection of such statistics. The act approved August 7, 1916, requires the Bureau of the Census to collect data as to the several kinds of cotton fiber used in the manufacture of guncotton and explosives of all kinds during the calendar year 1915 and each quarter thereafter.

Under the heading entitled "Cotton Used in Explosives" the report says:

The manufacture of smokeless powders at the present time requires a considerable quantity of cotton fiber. Guncotton, technically known as nitrocellulose, obtained by nitration of cellulose, forms the principal ingredient of these powders. The purest form of cellulose and this fiber is used almost exclusively in the manufacture of guncotton. The quantity of bleached cotton fiber consumed in the manufacture of explosives during the calendar year 1915 was 244,003 bales, 583,610 bales in 1916, and 187,308 during the first quarter of 1917, the largest amount for any preceding quarter.

Further on the report states:

Before the cotton fiber can be used in the manufacture of explosives it is necessary that it be thoroughly cleaned and purified. In some instances the manufacturers of explosives have installed machinery for this purpose, but the majority of them purchase the fiber in the bleached and purified condition. Owing to this fact, it is impracticable to obtain data showing the quantity of unbleached cotton, linters, hull fiber, and waste used in this manufacture. In bleaching and purifying for nitrating purposes there is considerable loss, depending on the condition of the raw fiber, some stock being quite clean and some very trashy. However, it would appear from the information at hand that the loss in preparing linters and hull fiber from the wrapped and iron-bound bale to the purified material as used in nitration is between 30 percent and 40 percent. Based on an average loss of 35 percent, the gross weight of unbleached cotton fiber used in the manufacture of explosives in the United States during the calendar year 1916 was 898,000 bales.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from South Carolina 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized 3 additional minutes.

Mr. HARE. It is seen, therefore, in 1916, the year before we entered the war, nearly 1,000,000 bales were consumed in the manufacture of explosives alone. The Director of the Census Bureau advises that data are not available showing the amount used or consumed in 1917 and 1918, for the reason that the collection and publication of such information was discontinued at the request of the Navy Department in order that the enemy might not be furnished with information which would be of value in making war upon this country. However, it is reasonable to assume that we continued to manufacture explosives to as great extent in 1917 and 1918, while the war was on, as we did in 1916, the year before we entered the war. If so, then a reasonable estimate would be that we consumed at least 3,000,000 bales of cotton during the war in the manufacture of explosives alone; and if we consumed more in 1917 and 1918 than we did in 1916, which is also a reasonable assumption, it is not unlikely that the United States consumed upward of 4,000,000 bales during the recent World War. It is obvious, therefore, that cotton is indispensable in case of war; and if we are going to maintain an army and navy and be reasonably prepared for any emergency, we must have a sufficient quantity of munitions in reserve; and as cotton is absolutely indispensable as a munition, it is essential that the War Department be required to maintain a reasonable supply at all times. If the World War had been delayed 4 years and come on us in 1921, when we had a production of less than 8,000,000 bales, we would not have had enough cotton to have met our domestic requirements and furnished our Army and Navy with munitions enough to have sufficiently and successfully carried on our military operations.

We find, even with the large crop produced in 1917 and the large surplus on hand, our military officers were apprehensive that the supply would not be sufficient to meet our military demands. This statement is predicated on information found in a report of The Assistant Secretary of War issued in 1919, showing use of munitions in 1917 and 1918. On page 106 is found this statement:

The first step taken in the endeavor to meet the need for raw material was an attempt to provide a substitute for cellulose in case a shortage of cotton should render its use necessary.

In other words, gentlemen, we find our Government in 1917, immediately after entering the war, preparing to make a substitute for cotton to be used in the manufacture of explosives, and these steps were made necessary because our Government had failed in time of peace to provide a sufficient and necessary amount of cotton in reserve as a munition. They felt that there was not enough cotton available to meet the demands, and they knew that if we did not have it there was no chance to get it from anyone else, and for these reasons they took steps to find a substitute. Therefore, from the standpoint of preparedness and military economy, our War Department should have on hand at all times a sufficient supply of cotton to meet any emergency that may arise. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, and those of you who are among the 20 or 30 assembled this afternoon to debate a bill appropriating or pertaining to the appropriation of $500,000,000 of the people's money, we are presumably discussing national defense. When the Navy appropriation bill was pending before this House, the sabers rattled and the planes roared under the influence of the propagandists of this country, who whipped not only the Congress but the people of this Nation into a feverish fear and feeling that we were about to be attacked by some foreign nation. I am wondering if the proponents of this spirit of fear now feel they have so successfully influenced the Congress that it is no longer necessary for them to be here to even consider the merits of the bill now under consideration. [Applause.]

It has been said repeatedly upon the floor of the House and published in the press as well as in responsible literature of this country that the greatest and most direct menace to the welfare of the peace of this Nation lies not in the threat of any foreign government but in the failure of our own Government to solve our domestic problems and to deal with the subversive influences which are running rampant here in America. If these influences are not checked, you are going to have to deal with national defense here at home and consider that question rather than deal with an attack from some nebulous enemy from abroad, and, take it from me, I am fresh from the people and I know what they are thinking and saying.

Mr. Chairman, there stood upon the floor of this House last week two gentlemen, the distinguished gentleman from Colorado and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN]. Both of these gentlemen worked themselves up into a frenzy, waved the flag, and proclaimed their patriotism in denouncing a meeting held at Madison Square Garden attended by some 20,000 citizens of America under the designation of the bund. These gentlemen denounced in no uncertain terms the activities of that organization and the speeches made at that meeting.

I hold in my hand one of numerous newspaper clippings reporting a meeting held in that same auditorium, Madison Square Garden, last Monday night, which was attended by 20,000 Communists, called for the purpose of celebrating the twentieth anniversary of the Communist Party in America.

Despite the fact that this meeting was given the same publicity by the newspapers of this country as the bund meeting held a couple of weeks ago, I heard nothing but silence from these liberal leftists over on the Democratic side, who take the opportunity whenever it is presented to take a crack at every other organization except the Communist Party.

Mr. Chairman, I am wondering, and I have wondered since last Monday, what has become of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], who stated that he stood on the outside of the bund meeting, among his comrades, and saw this terrible disgrace to America taking place?

He has not been here denouncing this Communist meeting held in New York, neither has there been a word from any other liberal, so-called, denouncing this meeting of Communists in New York. I wish to say to you I think it is high time that these gentlemen not only denounce the meeting of the bund but, if they are sincere in their protestations of patriotic impulses, they ought to stand here on the floor and in the same language denounce the activities of the Communist Party, which is the major party of destruction in America. [Applause.]

I never heard of the German Bund in America until the Communist Party of America began to destroy the institutions we love. It seems to be a matter of recorded history, as stated by responsible people in this country of ours, that the Nazi Party in Germany was a natural protest against the constant invasion of communistic Russia and its doctrine into the rest of the world. Let me say to you it is my humble opinion that once we are able to stamp out and stem this growing tide of communistic propaganda that is evidenced on all sides there will be a continuous growth of resistance to that form of propaganda and we will be having transferred to the internal affairs of this Government of ours the very battles that are being fought over there in Europe.

It seems to me it is high time that instead of spending so much time talking about national defense against enemies of the Old World, or of the Orient, we in America ought to begin to spend some time and some money to coordinate our efforts in a defense against the insidious activities of these subversive influences in America. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEEFE. Not just now.

It seems passing strange, Mr. Chairman, that the same type of men and the same gentlemen who so vigorously opposed the Dies committee and the appropriation of $100,000 for the Dies committee are so silent and say nothing in the face of a Communist meeting in New York under the leadership of Israel Amter and 20,000 of his like in Madison Square Garden.

I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, the time has come when the truth is going to be told in the Well of this House and the people of America are going to be told the truth. We are not going to hide behind the flimsy speeches of patriotism that are being offered here by these leftist-minded individuals who want to wave the flag and hide behind it in protecting the activities of their Communist friends. I condemn them both, as I said the other day in no uncertain language.

While we are talking about national defense, let us talk in defense of the domestic affairs of America as well as in defense against a nebulous, nonexistent, undefined threat from some foreign country or nation that has not as yet been named. I repeat again, the challenge that comes to this Congress from the people of America is, Let us get down to business and solve the problem of unemployment. I say to the people on the other side, who so proudly proclaimed in their campaigns, "A job for every man and woman that is willing to work," Where are the jobs?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEEFE. Not now.

I say to you that unless we do something about it, 15,000 farmers in Wisconsin will lose their farms in the next year and a half because of their inability to meet the payments due on their mortgages. We are talking about national defense. What are we doing to solve our domestic problems when all the measures that are offered toward the end of inspiring confidence in the hearts of the people and of the businessmen of this Nation still lie locked up in the committee awaiting the will and the caprice of the administration to bring them out into the open? [Applause.] I believe it is time we as a Congress begin to think of the people of America and carry out some of the promises made in the last election. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak a few moments on our foreign policy. I would like to ask the question, What has happened in the last few months that imperils the safety of the United States? Who is it that is about to invade or attack us? What foreign nation has issued threatening statements concerning the United States?

When we trace down this war hysteria we find that it originates with high officials in the administration. It is the New Deal's spokesmen who have sounded the alarm. It is they, who have flagrantly preached the doctrines of hate in an attempt to turn the American people against certain nations and in sympathy with others.

Individually, I may be in sympathy with certain things that go on in the world, and I may be very much out of sympathy with other things that happen. But as a Congressman of the United States, that is none of my business, because it is the desire and wish of the American people that we do not police the world.

Charge me with partisanship if you wish, yet the fact remains, a recent poll of the Nation's editors shows that the vast majority of them believe that we are being eased into a war. The American people are intelligent, they can detect the identity of such statements as "the democracies of the world must stand together," with the catch words that were used in 1917, such as "we are fighting a war to make the world safe for democracy."

It must be kept in mind that leaders of government do not fight the wars. The people pay for the wars in their blood and in the debt that it creates and the havoc that follows a war. I would remind you that so far as the whole peoples are concerned there are no outlaw nations. There may be outlaw leaders of government.

If we are in danger of war, the Congress and the people should have the facts, and if we are in such danger we should put our financial house in order and, what is more, we should restore agriculture and start to produce. The granaries of our country are in no position for a war.

Perhaps it would be partisan to say so, but no one can help but wonder that if the present administration had not made such a mess of every problem that it has undertaken, including the farm program, unemployment relief, and recovery, would there be any necessity for this so-called war hysteria? [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, when I look around here and see this crowded Hall of Congress I am encouraged greatly to speak. I am a good deal like a preacher we had up in our western country who was a good preacher, but was a little bit too liberal for the conservative element that ran the affairs of the church. No one came to church except on Easter Sunday, when the conservatives all came out to exhibit their Easter purchases. At the conclusion of the sermon the preacher said, "My friends, I am very grateful for your coming out this morning. In case I do not see you again until another Easter I want to take this occasion to wish you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year." [Laughter.]

I believe the farming class of this section is doomed if this Congress does not act. The interest load alone against the farms in America, even if every other element that is holding down the price of grain and raising their cost of production were corrected, would sink the farmers. Let me prove it to you.

Foreclosures are proceeding right along in this country, probably more rapidly than they have proceeded in the last 20 months. I am advised by the administration that they are going to investigate the proposition of frequent foreclosures and see if they cannot prevent them, because every time you drive a farm family out on the highway there is nothing left for the Government to do but take care of them. The reason they are driven out is this: I have talked time and time again on this very subject, and I believe there are just as many people paying attention to me now as there were when I spoke before on the same subject.

During the Civil War we issued about $450,000,000 worth of greenbacks. At the present moment about $340,000,000 of this money is still circulating, and it does not cost anyone anything; there is no interest on it. With this demonstration of what we could do in this Nation to eliminate interest altogether, let me say that if all the money issued in America were issued in the same manner these greenbacks were you would break the backbone of the interest system, and you would drive the coupon clippers out into the world to get something useful to do.

Suppose now this debt of $343,000,000, the amount of greenbacks still outstanding, were drawing the same rate of interest the farmers have paid all these years, what would that $343,000,000 have grown to today? I know you will not believe it, but I am going to announce the result. If we had paid interest on this money at the same rate the farmers have been paying interest on first mortgages this $343,000,000 would today amount to $30,700,000,000.

If the Members of Congress think the people of America can beat this kind of interest system no matter what you do, you are just all wrong. When you consider also the fact that every bushel of wheat in the pit at Chicago is sold 268 times, and that one-eighth of a cent a bushel is added on every sale, you can see that those who deal in the gambling operations in the Chicago pit make more money per bushel than the farmer who raises the actual bushels of wheat.

Now, do you think this great country that we love can continue when we allow these practices to go ahead?

The same thing is true of cotton. Those who sell or deal in cotton futures make more money than the man who raises the cotton by the sweat of his brow.

I do not feel like finding fault with the President. The President may be wrong on some of these things and I, for one, have said so with my votes, but it is not the President's fault that we are sitting supinely here in this Congress and allowing this interest system to go ahead. All it takes is a majority of this body to change that system, and instead of doing this, you sit here and criticize the President. I do not know whether the President wants to do it or not. I do not know whether he has been advised as to what to do, but there are enough Members of Congress right here now who know the situation to show it by their votes. There are enough Members of Congress who understand this interest system to declare before the people of America that we have let private interests use the money of this Nation long enough and live off of the interest that the fellow who tills the soil and labors in the mills must pay.

I do not think we look upon the situation seriously enough yet. We have had so much liberty and freedom in America we do not appreciate it. We have had nothing but liberty, and we want to keep that liberty, but no free government can keep the confidence and respect of the people when it has over one-half of its population in distress. When men and women want to work they should have a chance to work, and it is the duty of this Government to see that they get a chance to work. I know there is not one-half of 1 percent of the people in my State who want to receive any gifts from the Government. They do not like the relief system. They want a chance to go to work, but there is no chance to put them to work, and the reason for it is that we are waiting for private business to furnish such work.

There is absolutely no chance for private business in America again to take up the slack of unemployment. We are faced with a new Government function and we do not know it.

This whole country went broke in 1920. Everybody in the farm belt knows that, but you are kept alive a little longer in the eastern section by the use of a new system of finance—installment payments that kept the country up from 1920 to 1929, but from the very beginning of this Government up to the year 1920, the business that operated in America was a business of exploitation. Whenever one section of the country was depleted, all they had to do was to move the people on to a new section and build railroads and build business institutions and start all over again.

I am just a fair sample of the average American. My people settled on the Atlantic seaboard in 1634, and I can follow their wandering from 1634 to the present moment. After 50 years of the pioneer settlement of America we find them moving back toward the Allegheny Mountains to new homes, because they lost their homes where they first settled, and way back in the dim days of 1730, we find our ancestors moving across the Allegheny Mountains into the Valley of the Ohio. Another 50 years elapsed and the interest system worked and when it worked and they could not pay, just as men and women cannot pay today under that system, they moved over into the prairies of Illinois and the timber lands of Wisconsin.

There they served another 50 years in the building of this great empire of the United States, but just as sure as 2 and 2 make 4, at the end of the next 50 years we find them moving into the Territories of Wyoming, North and South Dakota, and Montana, there to make a new home, and there we made new homes, but the 50 years elapsed in the 1920s, the average time it takes the farmers and the workers of this country to lose a home under this interest system, and we lost our homes.

I spoke at an old settlers' picnic at the end of the 50 years of settlement on the plains of Dakota just a few years ago, and there on that day, from the settlement of 26 families 50 years before, not a single home was left. Every single one of them was taken by this interest system and foreclosure. Business never before realized the situation. We could always move on. My father came out of the Civil War, serving the interests of this country, and when he got back to the State of Minnesota he found that the mortgagee had foreclosed on everything that he owned while he was serving in the forces of the North. He did not think much about it, because all he had to do was to load us in a covered wagon and we moved on to the Territory of Dakota, but the end of this exploitation came in 1920. There is no more new territory. It has all been conquered; there is no new place to go. The railroads cannot build new railroads and give employment to the thousands they used to give employment to in building into a new country.

The banking fraternity of this Nation cannot move on and start banks all over the country. You cannot start business of any kind. Private business, as operated in this country for 150 years, came to a definite stop in 1920; and if there is any exploitation going to take place in the future in this country, it must turn its back on the new frontier and begin the exploitation of each other, and that is what they are doing today. [Applause.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has referred to the installment system of buying as being partly responsible for the crash in 1929. That was the common story—installment buying by individuals from private concerns. Since that time the Government has gone into the installment business, so that the largest installment seller and the one to encourage that system of credit is the Government itself. The gentleman is aware of that fact?

Mr. BURDICK. I am aware that the payments offered by the Government are of the same character, to some extent, as the payments offered by private business in 1920, but the purposes are entirely different.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. But one can build a house or remodel a house or buy electrical equipment or anything else under Government installment buying.

Mr. BURDICK. But it is a question of absolute necessity now. The Government sees the necessity of trying to maintain these homes, but that was not the purpose that prompted business in giving these installment credits in 1920.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact: In 1933 the Government went into the loan business to help the farmers refinance their mortgages. I know the gentleman is familiar with the records today, where the Government itself is foreclosing tens of thousands of mortgages on farms in this country, and that the Government is not now showing any sympathetic interest to help those farmers. I would like to have the gentleman comment on that.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. HILL. If it was possible for President Lincoln in Civil War times to issue money to carry on the war without paying interest, could not the Congress, if it took back the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, put all of the idle people to work today to build roads and bridges and develop our natural resources in peacetimes?

Mr. BURDICK. I would say right now that the gentleman from Washington, as usual, is right. If we just had the courage to pass that House resolution which has been before us for 2 years, reasserting the power of this country over money, and issue the money without drawing interest, we could save in interest alone on our public bonds one and a half billion dollars per year; and if we wanted to get a few thousand dollars to kill off the grasshoppers, you would not be hollering economy all of the time. You go out to shoot an elephant and race down a jack rabbit. That seems to be the philosophy of this Congress.

Mr. HILL. What I want to emphasize is that it is the duty of Congress, and it is the fault of Congress if we do not do it.

Mr. BURDICK. Yes. It is not the fault of the President; it is not the gentleman's fault nor my fault; it is the combined fault of the Members of this body. If we should pass that resolution reasserting the power in Congress to handle the people's money, it would not make any difference what the President said, but we must take the responsibility. I do not want to hide behind anybody. I am willing to take that responsibility myself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. VREELAND] such time as he may desire.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I desire to state that I am heartily in favor of every economy in government consistent with the safety and welfare of our people. I am also firmly of the opinion, however, that war is one of the most costly expenditures of public funds that ever arises in any country, and the best insurance against war is a proper and adequate national defense. For that reason I am in favor of the bill under consideration.

My point in speaking before the committee is, in my opinion, a very necessary matter to consider in the general scheme of preparedness and national defense. We have been presented with two resolutions this year, declared to be emergency preparedness measures for the expansion of our national defense and much discussion accompanied both of them as to the necessity of enlarging our present home defenses, and considerable of the funds appropriated are to be used for the procurement of matériel and construction of bases. There has been little consideration given in either of those measures, and very little in the present resolution under consideration, for that large body of patriotic citizens giving of their time and services to train themselves for the service of their country in case a major emergency should arise. I am referring to the Reserve officers, and in making my remarks I give my own opinion and speak solely from my own experience as a Reserve officer and as vice president of the Department of New Jersey Reserve Officers' Association.

It might be well for a moment to speak on the source from which Reserve officers are obtained. Shortly after the war, and upon the organization of the Organized Reserves, the personnel was made up primarily of officers who had served during the war and noncommissioned officers who were willing to accept a commission in the Reserve. There are still a great many of such men still in the Reserve and carrying on with their patriotic duty in spite of their increase in years and, in a great many cases, physical incapability of active service. Since that time the Reserve officers have been appointed from three sources—the C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and specialists from civilian life whose civilian occupation qualifies them for a specialists' designation. The C. M. T. C. provides a very small percentage of the Reserve officers but does, however, give to the present commissioned Reserve officer an opportunity for training with troops. The R. O. T. C. is the main source from which the personnel is derived, particularly in the combat arms. The appointment from civilian life of the specialist, while he does not require perhaps the amount of training that the combat arms would need, nevertheless, to apply his experience in a civilian occupation under military conditions would necessitate a complete change in surroundings and require considerable study.

I admit and agree heartily that a well-trained man with no equipment or matériel is valueless. However, the converse is also true that modern equipment is of little use if there is insufficient trained manpower to operate it. It has been often said that it is not the gun but the man behind the gun that counts.

At the present time I understand there are approximately 100,000 Reserve officers with an appropriation to allow only 30,000 of these to be trained for a 14-day period in each fiscal year, which means that 70,000 of those in the active Reserve list will receive no training during the fiscal year except that which he may procure through his own endeavors by troop schools or correspondence courses, both of which, while advantageous, are nevertheless not the experience under actual conditions with troops that is so necessary. I understand it is contemplated that were a major emergency to arise that four armies, representing approximately 4,000,000 men, would be mobilized. It must be admitted that the 12,000 Regular Army commissioned officers would be wholly inadequate to officer the present standing Regular Army and take up the duties of the training of the newly mobilized forces. Therefore the job must fall on either Regular Army noncommissioned personnel or the Reserve officer, and were he not adequately or properly trained it would require considerably more time to prepare both the commissioned personnel and the enlisted personnel for the emergency he must face not only in the use of modern equipment but also in the handling of men and the strategic movements of large forces. We learned a lesson in 1917 by attempting to conjure commissioned personnel to officer our troops in the emergency, and while the officers commissioned gave all they had for the job ahead, nevertheless it must be said that, were they better trained, the objective might have been attained with a great deal less loss of personnel, time, and money.

At the present time the average Reserve officer must purchase uniforms and equipment. He must have a minimum of 20 hours in active duty per year to retain his commission, and if he desires to take advantage of the 14-day active period and there is sufficient appropriation to send him he must have to his credit 25 hours in active duty during the next preceding fiscal year. Inactive-duty credits can only be obtained in two ways—either by the attendance of troop schools and meetings or by correspondence school course work. It is true the correspondence course does not mean an outlay of any money to the individual, but does require considerable time and effort and a sacrifice on the part of the officer. Troop schools and meetings, regardless of how close the meeting place might be to the city wherein the officer resides, nevertheless require an expenditure of moneys for travel to the meeting; and, again, considerable time taken from other activities which he might put to a personal advantage.

If you will take the time to note the records, however, you will find that a great percentage of the 100,000 present commissioned Reserve officers carries on without complaint. He tries his best with the limited facilities and opportunities to train himself to be a good officer, and does it solely with the view in mind of being of service to his country when it needs him. These officers should be given the opportunity for better training, and to have better training it would require an increase in the Regular Army personnel. It would also require additional R. O. T. C. units in various schools throughout the country, and I am informed that there are more than 150 applications from the different colleges for the establishment of an R. O. T. C. unit, but there is insufficient Army personnel or funds to establish them.

Would it not be wiser to expend some of our funds for a worth-while investment to prevent war than to spend it on some of the present existing departments which are unconsciously, perhaps, but nevertheless lending haven and support to those who are not as patriotic as our defense forces. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD].

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a moment on social security.

It seems that by something that has gone out from the Department, the ministers of this Nation have the impression that they are going to be put under the Social Security Act. I have heard from a great many of them in resolutions and letters. They are opposed to this possibility.

I have before me from the Susquehanna Valley Baptist Pastors' Conference of West Oneonta, N. Y., many letters in opposition to being placed under social security. I will read a short paragraph from what they have to say with regard to this:

The Susquehanna Valley Baptist Pastors' Conference at its regular monthly meeting held in the River Street Baptist Church, Oneonta, N. Y., Monday, February 20, unanimously voted to oppose the bill now before Congress regarding social-security taxes and benefits for ministers and church employees on the ground that it constitutes an infringement on the constitutionally guaranteed doctrine of the complete separation of church and state. The ministers in this conference feel that such an adoption would be the entering wedge toward the abolishment of full religious liberty in this country.

I have other letters from the Presbyterian Church and some from the Church of Christ.

I have a telegram from the First Baptist Church of Endicott, N. Y., which reads:

First Baptist Church, Endicott, N. Y., 720 members, unanimously voted Wednesday night strong opposition to extension of provisions of Social Security Act to churches. Request your active interest in defeating proposal.

That is signed by the minister, Rev. Frederick H. Sterns.

I have other communications from ministers in various parts of our district along this same line. They state that they have a social-security plan of their own that is working well. It does not ask for a contribution of any great amount from the ministers or from their congregations. They are opposed to going under the same social-security plan as industries are today. They point out that the salaries of the ministers are very small. If 1 or 2 or 3 or 7 percent is taken from their salaries, it will amount to more than they can afford to expend for this service. They are asking this body not to put them under the social-security plan. I believe this is quite general throughout our Nation; but, as far as I am concerned, I am only speaking for my district.

I have here a notice from one of the leading daily papers of New York, from which I wish to read a few short passages:

I think we should be quite sure that we are not depriving ourselves of actual benefits before we take such a step.

Quoting further:

It is a direct instance of the Government's taxing a charitable institution—the church of God—and, if we allow it to become a fact, who knows where such oppression will end?

And again:

The benefits of social security are doubtful in any event, and our funds offer, in most cases, more adequate security than any Government-operated agency.

We all know that social security and unemployment insurance have taken a great deal of money from industry which, if reinvested in industry, would have added very materially to solving the unemployment situation.

From that viewpoint I think it is something we should be very, very careful about before we add any more groups to the present social security of unemployment plan.

The Ways and Means Committee has been conducting hearings for weeks on various phases of social security. I certainly hope that some bill will be reported from the committee that will be more fair to the employers and employees than the social-security plan which we have at the present time. It has been advocated, and I think quite rightly, that we should carry along our social security on a much broader plane; that we should take into social security men in every walk of life who are not getting along well when they arrive at an age where they need security. For instance, the farmer and the farm hand, the real backbone of our country today, do not come under this social-security plan. If we are going to offer security, we should offer security for all. The kind of security we offer is something we should be very, very careful about. It is something which I believe should be distributed on a much wider basis. We should not ask a few to bear this burden. We should not take out of industry an amount that should perhaps be distributed over the whole Nation.

I am appearing here today for the ministers of my district, and I hope that this Congress will not enact a law bringing ministers under control of the social security or in any other manner. You can see by their statements that they are very dubious about the Government's having any part in the religious activities of the churches of this Nation.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. HAWKS. The gentleman may be interested to know that from my district in Wisconsin I receive many letters pertaining to the same subject, in opposition to this proposed legislation. The ministers of Wisconsin are just as strongly opposed to it as are the ministers in the gentleman's own district. The same is true of churches as denominations.

Mr. LORD. I thank the gentleman. I think the feeling is Nation-wide at the present time.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. TALLE. I, too, have received telegrams and letters telling the same story as that recited by the gentleman from New York. These letters come from Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Lutherans, and Catholics. I have messages from fraternal orders, from hospitals, and from private denominational colleges, all fearing the encroachment of the state upon the church. These messages are all opposed to any system being superimposed upon the systems they already have and with which they are thoroughly satisfied.

Mr. LORD. I thank the gentleman. I think this is the common word we receive from the clergy throughout the Nation.

There is no question but what the Social Security Act was brought about very hastily. It was not well considered and it has proven very, very detrimental in many cases. While the intention of Congress in passing the act was good, and while the act itself has been of some benefit both in the matter of old-age pensions and unemployment insurance, yet it is something that needs revamping and revising before we shall have a system that will be satisfactory and that will extend its benefits to all the people of the Nation. The time has come when we should revise the Social Security Act. I believe committees of this Congress are considering it very carefully. When it does come before us we should go into it very carefully, as the Committee on Ways and Means has been going into it for weeks. I express the hope that if we do, we shall be able to bring out a revamped Social Security Act that will be fair to everybody in this Nation.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is there any reason why the people the gentleman has been describing should not have a perfect right to express their desires?

Mr. LORD. That is what we think.

Mr. KELLER. Does not the gentleman think so? I do.

Mr. LORD. I would not be presenting their case otherwise. I think they should have consideration. Their views should be considered very carefully before they are brought under the present system of social security. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4630, the War Department appropriation bill, 1940, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON] may be permitted to revise and extend his own remarks and to include therein a statement made by him before the Ways and Means Committee on February 20, 1939, in reference to H. R. 2, the Townsend plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a letter which I received from a constituent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, March 3, 1939, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Public hearings will continue Friday, March 3, 1939, at 10 a. m., on social-security legislation in the Ways and Means Committee room in the New House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Friday, March 3, 1939. Business to be considered: Railroad rate differentials.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors will meet Friday, March 3, 1939, at 10:30 a. m., to hold hearings on H. R. 295, H. R. 922, H. R. 2890, H. R. 4170, and H. R. 4314, all bills for the control of water pollution.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors will meet Tuesday, March 7, 1939, at 10:30 a. m., to continue hearings on H. R. 3222 and H. R. 3223, bills for the completion of the construction of the Atlantic-Gulf Ship Canal across Florida.

COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures will meet on Friday, March 3, 1939, at 9:30 a. m., in room 115, House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

There will be a meeting of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation at 10:30 a. m. Friday, March 3, 1939.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

There will be a hearing before the Special Subcommittee on Bankruptcy and Reorganization of the Committee on the Judiciary at 10 a. m. Monday, March 6, 1939, on the bill (H. R. 3704) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; room 346, House Office Building.

Beginning at 10 a. m. on Wednesday, March 22, 1939, there will be a hearing held before the Subcommittee No. 4 of the Committee on the Judiciary on House Joint Resolution 176, declaring the conservation of petroleum deposits underlying submerged lands adjacent to and along the coast of California, below low-water mark and under the territorial waters of the United States of America, essential for national defense, maintenance of the Navy, and regulation and protection of interstate and foreign commerce; reserving the same as a naval petroleum reserve, subject to any superior vested right, title, or interest; and authorizing appropriate judicial proceedings to assert, ascertain, establish, and maintain the right and interest of the United States of America in such reserve, and to eject trespassers.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will hold public hearings in room 219, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., at 10 a. m. Tuesday, March 7, 1939, on the bill (H. R. 4307) to extend the provisions of the Shipping Act, 1916, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, to all common carriers by water in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will hold public hearings in room 219, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., at 10 a. m., on the bills and dates listed below:

Tuesday, March 14, 1939:

H. R. 180, H. R. 202, construction of a Nicaraguan Canal; H. R. 201, additional facilities for Panama Canal; H. R. 2667, construction of a Mexican Canal.

In listing the bills to be heard on March 14, 1939, House Joint Resolution 112 (TINKHAM), to create a commission to study and report on the feasibility of constructing the Mexican Canal, was inadvertently omitted from the notice.

This is to advise all interested parties that House Joint Resolution 112 will be considered at that time with the following bills: H. R. 180 (IZAC), relative to the construction of a Nicaraguan Canal; H. R. 202 (BLAND), relative to the construction of a Nicaraguan Canal; H. R. 201 (BLAND), need for additional lock facilities at Panama; H. R. 2667 (TINKHAM), relative to the construction of a Mexican Canal.

Tuesday, March 21, 1939:

H. R. 137, H. R. 980, H. R. 1674, relating to annuities for Panama Canal construction force.

Thursday, March 23, 1939:

H. R. 139, H. R. 141, H. R. 142, H. R. 1819, miscellaneous Panama Canal bills.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

475. A letter from the president, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting the draft of a proposed bill relating to benefit assessments from condemnation proceedings for the opening, extension, widening, or straightening of alleys or minor streets; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1486. By Mr. BOLLES: Resolutions of Local No. 253, American Federation of Teachers, Milwaukee, Wis., opposing any amendments to the National Labor Relations Act; to the Committee on Labor.

1487. By Mr. HOUSTON: Petition of certain citizens of Oxford, Kans., requesting that traffic in materials from the United States which is compelling us to be a partner in the destruction of the Chinese people be brought to an end; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1488. By Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY: Resolution of the United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association of Chicago, concerning the distribution of surplus perishable food products; to the Committee on Agriculture.

1489. Also, letter from Gane & Ingram, manufacturing chemists, New York City, opposing House bill 3536, concerning tax on imported menthol; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1490. By Mr. LEAVY: Petition of Spokane Post, No. 9, American Legion, set forth in a letter by Adjutant Lang, recognizing that the natural vulnerability of the State of Washington and the Pacific Northwest to enemy attack has been enhanced by the advancement of speedy aircraft, recalling the terrors to which citizens of London and Paris were subjected in the desperate days of the World War, directing attention to the strategic importance of protecting the huge Federal investments in Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams for the production of electrical energy, and urging Congress and the administrative authorities of our defense agencies to carefully consider the establishment of adequate air-defense units, particularly east of the Cascade Range and thus utilize a natural barrier to invading forces; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

1491. By Mr. MARSHALL: Petition of employees of Wilknit Hosiery Co., Greenfield, Ohio, relative to registering a protest against House bill 1818, introduced by Mr. COLMER, because this bill would give individual States the right to tax interstate commerce and curtail many businesses dealing in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1492. By Mr. MERRITT: Resolution of the Women's Civic Club of Flushing, N. Y., opposing the lowering of the immigration quotas; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

1493. Also, resolution of the Women's Civic Club of Flushing, N. Y., protesting against the appointment of Mr. Amlie as Interstate Commerce Commissioner because he advocates destroying our profit system; that he is an enemy of law and constitution and is an associate of leading Communists in this country and approves their communistic efforts and ideas; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1494. Also, resolution of the Women's Civic Club of Flushing, N. Y., favoring the extension of the Dies committee and requests that information obtained by it be used to prosecute those found working for the destruction of our Government; to the Committee on Rules.

1495. Also, resolution of the Women's Civic Club of Flushing, N. Y., opposing the war powers bill, which constitutes too much power in the President and takes from Congress the authority given to it by our Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1496. By Mr. O'NEAL: Petition of sundry citizens of Louisville, Ky., in behalf of House bill 11; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1497. By Mr. SANDAGER: Memorial of the Rhode Island Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, urging the nonparticipation in foreign affairs and the further development of the War and Navy Departments; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1498. By Mr. SCHAEFER of Illinois: Petition of Division 49, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Elmer N. Mank, legislative representative, East St. Louis, Ill., opposing legislation to limit mileage or hours for railroad engineers and firemen; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1499. By Mr. SCHIFFLER: Petition of Walter L. Pitzler, clerk, Bethesda Baptist Church of Barrackville, W. Va., protesting against including pastors and paid church workers in the social-security plan; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1500. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the Northern California Public Health Association, petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to public health, also known as La Follette-Bulwinkle bill; to the Committee on Appropriations.

1501. Also, petition of the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, Cement Workers Local No. 356, Concord, Calif., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to the Wagner Act; to the Committee on Labor.

1502. Also, petition of the Board of Port Commissioners of the City of Oakland, Calif., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to Senate Joint Resolution No. 24, of the Seventy-sixth Congress of the United States, concerning title of submerged lands or tidelands; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1503. Also, petition of the San Francisco District Industrial Union Council, San Francisco, Calif., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to the Wagner Act; to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1939

(Legislative day of Monday, February 27, 1939)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, immortal and invisible, forgive the faltering faith of those who have their dwelling among the mortal and the seen, and come to us in the common ways of life, for we cannot come to Thee. The heavens declare the glory of God, but our earth-bound eyes cannot read their story of infinity and peace; a bush may burn with fire, yet we do not turn aside, and in this vale of time and sense there is holy ground which our pressing feet may never apprehend.

Our world, O righteous Father, never needed Thee so much as now. Come and deliver us from our false sense of freedom, our feeble pleasures, our fatal self-indulgence, and from every cloying sin. Clothe our failing flesh with Thy renewing glory and breathe through the things that are seen the peace and joy of the unseen and eternal. We ask it in our Saviour's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Thursday, March 2, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. Downey], the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. Schwelzenbach] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Holt] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to consider and act upon a bill now pending in the Congress of the United States authorizing the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the admission of Wyoming into the Union as the first State guaranteeing equal suffrage to women.

Whereas there is now pending in the current session of the Congress of the United States of America proposed legislation authorizing the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the admission of Wyoming into the Union as the first State guaranteeing equal suffrage to women; and

Whereas the Legislature in the State of Wyoming now in session believes that this fiftieth anniversary should be fittingly commemorated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by this Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress aforesaid be, and is hereby, memorialized to promptly consider and pass said bill; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of said United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of said Congress, United States Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, United States Senator HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and Congressman FRANK O. HORTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to consider and pass proposed Federal legislation relating to the Reciprocal Trade Act

Whereas there is now pending or will be pending in the current session of the Congress of the United States of America proposed legislation amending the Reciprocal Trade Act so as to require a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate to confirm any reciprocal trade agreement negotiated in the future; and

Whereas thousands of Wyoming citizens, especially all citizens interested in the livestock interest in Wyoming, are keenly interested in the passage of said amendment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress aforesaid be and is hereby memorialized to promptly consider and pass said amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of said United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of said Congress, United States Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, United States Senator HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and Representative FRANK O. HORTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to immediately and favorably consider and act upon H. R. 2662 and H. R. 2663, being acts to amend the Federal Oil and Gas Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, as amended

Whereas there are now pending in the current session of the Congress of the United States of America two proposed bills to further amend the Federal Oil and Gas Leasing Act, as amended, and being H. R. 2662 and H. R. 2663; and

Whereas said H. R. 2662 proposes to extend certain oil and gas prospecting permits issued under said Federal Oil and Gas Leasing Act; and

Whereas said H. R. 2663 provides for the issuance of oil and gas leases with reasonable and workable rental, royalty, and bond provisions; and

Whereas said proposed legislation is necessary in the public-land States in order to promote the prospecting for minerals on the public domain located in the Western States, will be of great importance to all the citizens of Wyoming, will assist public education, will increase employment, and will add to the prosperity of this State and of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress aforesaid be, and is hereby, memorialized to immediately and favorably consider and act upon said bills H. R. 2662 and H. R. 2663 so amending said leasing act, in the interests of the citizens of the State of Wyoming and of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, United States Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, United States Senator HARRY H. SCHWARTZ, and Representative FRANK O. HORTON, and to the chairmen of the Public Lands Committees in the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of Agriculture to take action modifying the restrictions on the production of spring or hard wheat grown in the Northern States

Whereas widespread dissatisfaction exists among the producers of hard spring wheat in Minnesota and adjoining States relative to the unwarranted restriction imposed upon the growing of such wheat during the year 1939; and

Whereas no surplus exists in reference to such wheat; and Whereas the same amount of such wheat will be required in the manufacture of flour as has been required in the past; and

Whereas the land taken out of production of hard spring wheat cannot be profitably utilized in the raising of other commodities without creating a surplus in such other commodities; and

Whereas the farmers raising hard spring wheat will be subjected to extreme hardship by reason of being deprived of this means of making money to pay living expenses, taxes, interest, and loans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of Agriculture adopt immediate measures to meet the current crisis in the farming industry in Minnesota and the adjoining States growing hard spring wheat, and to establish such stabilization of prices on such wheat as will guarantee the producer at least the cost of production, and assure consumers an ample supply of American-grown farm commodities; be it further

Resolved, That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

The Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in regular session assembled, memorializes the Congress of the United States to take speedy action to assist in controlling grasshoppers in 1939.

Whereas in 1938 the farmers of the Northwest witnessed the largest migration of grasshoppers in recent history and these flights infested new territory, including the Red River Valley of Minnesota and other areas throughout the northern great plains area; and

Whereas the general situation is acute, particularly because of the danger of migratory attack and because of the interstate movement of these insects and because certain States are unable to cope with the situation, and it is therefore of paramount importance that the Federal Government take speedy action to assist in controlling these insects in 1939; and

Whereas definite surveys by entomologists of more than 24 States in cooperation with the Federal Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine indicate that grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, chinch bugs, and the new insect, the fringe beetle, must be given special consideration to avoid calamities in 1939; and

Whereas organization and educational work is already under way in the infested areas but the most effective preparation cannot be made until funds are available; and

Whereas past control programs have given excellent results and many millions of dollars' worth of crops have been saved for the farmers of the infested States; and

Whereas if poison-bait materials and other equipment for the control of these insects are on hand in time, the farmers can save their crops, but if appropriations are not made in time to provide an effective control campaign before crops are damaged, the farmers lose heart and give up: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in regular session assembled, That we memorialize the Congress of the United States to take speedy action to assist in controlling these insects in 1939 by making an appropriation of at least $6,000,000 for that purpose; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Minnesota be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of the Congress of the United States and to each Member of Congress from the State of Minnesota.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Concurrent resolution petitioning the Congress of the United States and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, respectively, to pass and approve an amendment to the Federal Social Security Act to provide Federal financial assistance to States for aid to needy crippled persons

Whereas there are thousands of crippled persons in the State of Minnesota who, because of their physical handicap, are unable to secure employment or adequately to provide for themselves, and hence are in destitute circumstances and in need of adequate assistance and aid; and

Whereas it is imperative and a necessity for the State of Minnesota and its political subdivisions to provide adequate assistance and aid to such needy crippled persons to safeguard their health and welfare, and

Whereas the State of Minnesota and its political subdivisions, which in the past have carried the entire burden of furnishing assistance and aid to such needy crippled persons, are no longer able to adequately do so; and

Whereas the State of Minnesota and its political subdivisions are urgently in need of Federal financial assistance for the purpose of enabling the State and its political subdivisions to provide adequately for such needy crippled persons: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the house of representatives concurring), That we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, respectively, to pass and approve an amendment to the Federal Social Security Act, now in force, to provide Federal financial assistance to States for aid to needy crippled persons; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; the Honorable John N. Garner, Vice President of the United States; the Honorable William B. Bankhead, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Lodge No. 3527 of the International Workers' Order, favoring the allotment of adequate funds to the subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor investigating violations of civil liberties, etc., to continue the investigation, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Inland Steel Lodge, No. 1010, affiliated with the C. I. O., protesting against extension of the operation or application of the wage and hour law in the steel industry, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Eastern Kentucky Education Association, Ashland, Ky., praying for the enactment of Senate bill 1305, providing Federal aid to educational institutions, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the third annual conference of the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born, New York City, relative to naturalization and the right of asylum, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a petition, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, praying that the shipment of arms and munitions of war to Japan for use in operations in China be stopped, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wichita, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the advertising of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MALONEY presented a petition of 120 citizens of Manchester, Conn., praying for the enactment of House bill 11, a general-welfare bill granting old-age assistance, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petitions of Russell Danielson and 100 other citizens of Danielson, and Roberta West and 11 other citizens of New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the lifting of the Spanish embargo, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of 113 citizens of the State of Connecticut, praying that the United States adhere to the general policy of neutrality as enunciated in existing law and extend the law to include civil as well as international conflicts, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. REED presented memorials of 15 citizens of Halliowell, 29 citizens of Chanute, 37 citizens of Hope, 42 citizens of Milton, 59 citizens of Fredonia, 104 citizens of Augusta, 157 citizens of Junction City, and 191 citizens of Labette County, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to include religious bodies within the operation of the social-security system, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of 19 citizens of Wichita, 22 citizens of Barber County, 84 citizens of Harvey County, 41 citizens of Pittsburg, and 105 citizens of Florence, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to limit the service of certain railroad employees to 208 hours in any 30-day period, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of 14 citizens of Oxford and 19 citizens of Dodge City, in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 280) to prohibit and to prevent the trade practices known as compulsory block booking and blind selling in the leasing of motion-picture films in interstate and foreign commerce, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of 29 citizens of Galesburg and 33 citizens of Greenleaf, in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of Senate bill 1234, to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of 34 citizens of Iola and 42 citizens of Trego, Ellis, and Gove Counties, in the State of Kansas, praying that measures be taken to stop the traffic in arms and munitions from the United States to Japan for use in operations in China, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TAXES ON CERTAIN VEGETABLE OILS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. CONNALLY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3790) relating to the taxation of the compensation of public officers and employees, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. GILLETTE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3790) relating to the taxation of the compensation of public officers and employees, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

"YANKEE CLIPPER"

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask consent to submit a resolution which I will read.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 92) was read by Mr. REYNOLDS and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas in the world today the term "aviation" has come to convey too extensively the thought of military aviation alone; and Whereas the peaceful use of the great art of aviation in commercial international intercourse is of profound and fundamental importance; and

Whereas the United States, while it does not boast of being first in the striking power of its military aviation, does and is proud to lead the world in its civil aviation; and

Whereas this American leadership began with the first airplane flight made by man, that of Orville Wright at Kitty Hawk, N. C., on December 17, 1903; was maintained by Colonel Lindbergh, the first to fly nonstop from New York to Paris; and is now to be further gloriously emphasized by a third event, 35 years after the first, the establishment of the first scheduled commercial service across the Atlantic—again by America; and

Whereas there is present in Washington today Pan American Airways' Yankee Clipper, the flagship of a new fleet of the largest airplanes in the world, greater each than the ships of Columbus and capable of doing in 24 hours what took Columbus 72 days; and

Whereas this airplane is today to be christened by the first lady of the land with appropriate ceremonies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate does hereby express its approval and appreciation of the efforts of all those who have contributed to the success of this great American commercial aircraft which, with its sister ships, will speed half way across the world on peaceful errands.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE LATE SENATOR ROBINSON, OF ARKANSAS

Mrs. CARAWAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 93), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed, with an illustration, and bound for the use of the Joint Committee on Printing, 1,000 additional copies of the volume of memorial addresses delivered or presented in the Senate and House of Representatives on the life and character of Hon. Joseph Taylor Robinson, late a Senator from Arkansas.

PROTECTION AND MAINTENANCE OF AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Several days ago a mammoth mass meeting was held in the Seventh Regiment Army in the city of New York, attended by from 10,000 to 12,000 persons. There was introduced and adopted by those in attendance upon that meeting a resolution, which I ask to have published as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas this assembly of American citizens have dedicated themselves to uphold all American institutions and the form of government established by the founders of the Republic 150 years ago; and

Whereas this assembly holds communism to be a menace to American institutions and the maintenance of friendly relations with foreign states: Be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States enforce upon all executive officers of this Nation an attitude of absolute neutrality in foreign controversies, forbid an accord of special privileges in secrecy to any foreign power, and emphatically condemn indulgence in abusive and contemptuous comment upon rulers of foreign states, upon the forms of government they administer, or upon the domestic policies and morals of friendly peoples; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States take immediate and effective steps to prevent the involvement of the United States in war for any purpose other than the defense of the vital interests of our Nation and the rights and safety of our people.

POLITICAL SURVEY BY FORTUNE MAGAZINE—ARTICLE BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

[Mr. BILBO asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Fortune Survey," by Ernest K. Lindley, published in the Washington Post of March 3, 1939, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE TRAFFIC SAFETY PROBLEM—STATEMENT BY PAUL G. HOFFMAN

[Mr. REYNOLDS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Paul G. Hoffman, President, Automotive Safety Foundation, entitled "Orderly Traffic—The Automotive Safety Objective," which appears in the Appendix.]

ADMISSION OF GERMAN REFUGEE CHILDREN

[Mr. WAGNER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an announcement of the formation of a National-wide organization to be known as the Non-Sectarian Committee for German Refugee Children, and also sundry newspaper editorials on the problem of refugee children, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3791) to provide more effectively for the national defense by carrying out the recommendations of the President in his message of January 12, 1939, to the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] had not concluded his remarks. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on yesterday I pointed to the large existing belief that the United States was being eased into war. I quoted students and authorities in the international arena who were expressing belief that our country was sticking its nose into European affairs to a point that not only jeopardized American welfare and security but lessened the chance of peaceful settlement of European problems by Europe itself. I insisted that the situation was splendidly summarized by Demaree Bess in his Saturday Evening Post article of a week ago, when he said:

In the months which have passed since the so-called peace of Munich I have been traveling over a considerable part of Europe, studying the effects of the Munich settlement upon several European countries. In the course of these travels I have made one discovery which probably will shock most Americans. I have found that a surprising number of Europeans, little people and big people, in little countries and big countries, are more apprehensive today about the foreign policy of one particular country than of any other. That country is not, as you might suspect, Hitler's Germany. It is our own United States.

That may sound like a bad joke to Americans, but it is no joke to these Europeans. There is one thing that the majority of Europeans want more than anything else at the present moment, and that thing is peace. They don't believe, since the Munich settlement, that their peace is immediately threatened from Germany or from any other European country. But they have become fearful that the United States may precipitate that general war in Europe which Europeans have paid so dearly to prevent.

Nonsense? Well, maybe. But if you go around now in different countries in Europe and talk to different kinds of people, you will find that many Europeans have some such thoughts as I have described. They may be wrong, but that is what they are thinking.

My effort of yesterday was one to substantiate my expressed and challenged conviction that there would be no war in Europe this spring, this year, or next year unless the United States encourages, urges, and eggs Europe into it. The effort was one intended to demonstrate that if, as one Senator has insisted, my conviction as expressed was palaver, irresponsible, careless, flippant, childish, loose, prejudiced, and unsubstantial, then I was not alone, for many others were in camp expressing like convictions.

It appears that a question remains for me to answer: Is there in this country a man, group of men, or influence that so controls the destinies of nations that it may dictate war?

There are definitely such men, groups, and influences. Those in whose hands rest powers to serve selfish commercial interests through profit available from other people's wars are among them. Those whose foreign favors and prejudices are so strong as to blind them to truly American interests are others. But the greatest force or influence of all that may dictate war is composed of those who shape and direct the foreign policy of our great Nation.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], in his eloquent criticism of my expressed opinion, has sent me back to school. The Senator has obviously read, somewhere, sometime, probably in the Constitution, that Congress has the power to declare war. But surely the Senator cannot be blind to the fact that the exercise of this power by Congress is greatly influenced by forces which might, through secrecy and uncertainty, bring to Congress a set of circumstances, a situation, that would find Congress with no honorable alternative to a declaration of war.

It was St. Paul who said:

When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

Let no one misunderstand. Unfortunately, the Constitution of the United States is too frequently read only in childhood; and many of us, when we were children in the eighth grade, with 12-year-old minds and 12-year-old mentalities, spoke as children concerning the powers of Congress granted under the Federal Constitution, including the power of Congress to declare war.

In many instances, as we restudy the history and Government of the United States of America, we understand the "war power" as children understand it. Reading the letter of the Constitution, article I, section 5, does declare that Congress shall have power "to declare war"; but must we think as children think, understand as children understand, and speak as children speak? The words, the understandings, and the thoughts of childhood are sometimes permitted to endure down through the years into manhood.

Mr. President, I yield to no man in my love of the Constitution, in letter and in spirit. Yet if there be a Member of this body who believes that Congress objectively deliberates upon the question of war, and that Congress comes, through objective deliberation, to a decision based upon facts and upon logical reasoning upon those facts, I say in all frankness: Let us put aside childish things and tie to the realism of adult mental life.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NYE. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator intend to elaborate upon the many wars in which we have engaged without a declaration of Congress?

Mr. NYE. No; I have no such plan at this time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I will do so.

Mr. NYE. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We made war on Mexico in 1916. We took Veracruz. We invaded Mexico with an army without a declaration of war by Congress.

We made war on Russia in 1918 without a declaration of war by Congress and without even a proclamation by the President. We conducted that war for more than a year after the signing of the armistice growing out of the World War.

Together with the British Navy, we bombarded Nanking, I think, in 1926.

We took charge of Haiti without a declaration of war, conducted war there, and took charge of the Government for many years.

We did the same thing in Nicaragua.

We did the same thing in the Dominican Republic without a declaration of war by Congress.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

True, Mr. President, when the American Colonies assembled their representatives in the First and Second Continental Congresses, the patriot party objectively reviewed and considered the facts which drove them, step by step, toward rebellion against the mother country. They placed those facts before the intelligent minds of the early patriots; and in the Second Continental Congress their argument upon those facts was completed, reduced to form, submitted to that Congress at Philadelphia, adopted on July 4, 1776, published on July 6, engrossed on parchment, and signed by Members on August 2.

To the everlasting credit of our colonial forefathers let it be noted that not one of the 27 indictments levied against Great Britain has ever been successfully challenged or disputed by a reputable historian from that day to this.

Mr. President, in 1789, when the Constitution of the United States was adopted and the war power placed squarely in the hands of the Congress of the United States, it was the intention of the founding fathers that war would never be entered upon except that the Congress of the United States had the facts as the Continental Congress had the facts and the opportunity to deliberate upon them, and, furthermore, unless, with logic in the argument upon those facts, it was clearly obvious to the patriots of later days that war, and war alone, was justified. The Revolutionary forefathers followed Jefferson as he wrote:

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name, and by authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare—

The independence of America. Finally, in support of the Declaration, Jefferson wrote:

With a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

There was a time then when Congresses deliberated long in determining the step of going to war. But, Mr. President, that day has gone forever. Let us be realists. In the place of that day so far removed, a new day is here. It is the day of the war monger and the professional publicist. It is a day of rape of the intelligence of a people. It is a day of false and willful propaganda.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] quoted a line in debate the other day. It was from Pope's Essay on Man:

"A little learning is a dangerous thing." He might have recalled the second line, or the couplet:

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.

Mr. President, I make bold to assert that the Pierian springs are poisoned with propaganda. I make bold to assert that 20 years ago we were led like lambs to slaughter into the most cruel and merciless and useless war the world ever witnessed. I contrast the 27 charges levied against George III of England, which have stood the test of a century and a half of historic research, with the lies, the falsehoods, the fancies, the wild extravagances, the distortions of truth, the hypocrisies, so deftly foisted upon us by the paid propagandists of European powers which led our people like sheep to slaughter for the economic aggrandizement of empires.

I want to measure my words as I present the facts of the last World War to show beyond the peradventure of a doubt that "the willful 12" were good, able, far-seeing, honorable men, with minds keen and alert enough to detect the poisoned springs of propaganda and souls courageous enough to stand for truth in the midst of frenzied passion and diabolical hatred. I take for my authority the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, and my source is Harper's Magazine for March 1918, 11 months after the United States had entered the World War. The article is entitled "The United States and the War," and the author was not only distinguished throughout England but mentions the favorable reception given him upon his visit to the United States because of the wide circulation of his writings.

The Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, explains in his introduction that the United States for the first time was engaged in a world war, theretofore having fought only Great Britain, the Barbary pirates, Mexico, and Spain. He praises the idealism of our people and attributes it to the fact that we are "Britons in ancestry." He tells us that we are only fighting for "the principles of British freedom"; that "the souls of Hampton and William Penn and all the democratic nobility of the United Kingdom" were merely asserting themselves under distant skies, reaffirming the faith in the ancient doctrine laid down by the barons as they wrested Magna Carta from King John.

The Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, defends the American cause in the Revolutionary War. He praises our idealism, humaneness, and aspirations. He iterates and reiterates that we "have nothing to gain by success in this war, except something spiritual, mental, manly, national, and human."

Mr. President, the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, states plainly in this article that it would have been extremely difficult for the United States to enter the war 6 months before she did. He tells us he was in Washington when President Wilson dismissed Count Bernstorff and heard him do so. He states that President Wilson committed his country to the war at the right moment; neither too soon nor too late. He states that President Wilson had stopped up every avenue of attack by the pacifists and the jurists and the pedants and the pettifoggers.

Then in this most amazing article, written only a few months after the United States had gone into Europe's war, the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, reveals that he became responsible for American publicity practically since the day war broke out between England and the Central Powers. Then he states his activities in our America:

First. A weekly report to the British Cabinet on the state of American opinion.

Second. Constant touch with the permanent correspondents of American newspapers in England.

Third. Arrangements for important public men in England to act for England by interviews in American newspapers. Examples: Lloyd George, Viscount Grey, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Edward Carson, Lord Robert Cecil, Walter Runciman, Austen Chamberlain, Lord Cromer, Will Crooks, Lord Curzon, Lord Gladstone, Lord Haldane, Henry James, John Redmond, Mr. Selfridge, Mr. Zangwill, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, "and fully a hundred others."

Fourth. Supplying 360 newspapers in the smaller States in the United States with an English newspaper.

Fifth. Establishing a connection with the man in the street through the cinema, through interviews, articles, pamphlets.

Sixth. Individual replies to American critics printed in the chief newspaper of the State in which they lived, and copied in newspapers of neighboring States.

Seventh. Advising and stimulating people to write articles.

Eighth. Utilizing the friendly services and assistance of confidential friends.

Ninth. Receiving reports from important Americans.

Tenth. Establishing associations.

Eleventh. Personal correspondence with influential and eminent people of every profession, beginning with university and college presidents, professors, and scientific men and running through all the ranges of population.

Twelfth. Arranging for speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens; and supplying public libraries, Y. M. C. A. societies, universities, colleges, historical societies, clubs, and newspapers with literature.

Mr. President, these are the 12 methods of getting the United States into war, boasted of by the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, in charge of American publicity, on behalf of the British Empire. Sir Gilbert is not found concerned about the right of Congress to declare war. He did not bother about Congress. Since the day Britain declared war on Germany his job was to get this Nation in.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator failed to quote one important matter appearing in Sir Gilbert Parker's article, and if the Senator will read it carefully, I know he will find it. Sir Gilbert said he had to begin this propaganda in America very subtly and very diplomatically.

I also wish to point out that he started with the university presidents and college professors. Of course he was working through the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which pensioned the university professors and university presidents.

He also failed to mention that he was made chief of the military intelligence for propaganda of the British Government in 1914, and his job was to work through every available channel, particularly through university presidents and college professors. I think that in the recent years we have learned that peace societies are the main propagandists here in favor of our entering European politics and the World Court and the League of Nations under the theory that we must do our share in the next war.

I wish to call attention also to the fact that Sir Gilbert might have stated that before we entered the war the board of directors of the Carnegie Endowment passed a resolution saying that in their opinion the quickest and best way to bring about peace was for the United States to enter the war on the side of the Allies.

I thought it was very significant, if the Senator will permit me, that Sir Gilbert said that President Wilson committed the country to war at the right time. The propaganda had advanced to that point when the time was ripe to strike.

Mr. NYE. The job had been done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If there is anyone who doubts that such propaganda is going on now, all he has to do is listen to the radio and read the press. Many newspapers which on many other questions have opposed the President support him in his foreign policy.

Mr. NYE. Exactly. I suppose there are those who would want to cause the Senator from Minnesota to say, "Yes; all well and good; but what of it? After all, it does not mean we are going to war, because we have the power here in Congress to declare war. That power is ours exclusively."

I wish to show, and I am going to show, how little, how insignificant is that power of Congress, after all. I want to show how deliberate can be the effort to bring a state of circumstances before Congress which leaves us with no alternative but a declaration of war, if we are going to save our face and save whatever honor there may be.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator will recall that when Congress voted on the war question in 1917 it voted on a resolution stating that "a state of war now exists."

Mr. NYE. That is what it comes to, in any event.

Now, let us see what Sir Gilbert thought of it, and how the job he was destined to do was handled. I quote him:

I believed that the American people could not be driven, preached to, or chivied into the war, and that when they did enter it would be the result of their own judgment and not the result of exhortation, eloquence, or fanatical pressure of Britishers.

I had been in America through all these months of developing purpose and sentiment, and I had seen a whole people, who in January last had appeared to have grown indifferent to horror, suddenly amalgamate themselves, strip themselves of levity and indifference and the dangerous and insidious security of peace into a great fighting force, which is not the less a fighting force because down underneath everything in the United States is a love of peace and devotion to the acquisition of wealth.

Again I quote the distinguished Englishman, an authority on this particular subject:

When people tell me that the United States can be of little use in this war I ask myself, "What is use?" If the United States had not sent a man to France, her financial support of the Allies alone would be a throat grappler for Germany. I believe the United States is spending $24,000,000 a day, but only eight millions of that is for her own military equipment; the other sixteen millions are for loans to the Allies. And if the test of the belligerents is power to endure, surely the wealth and resources of the United States settle that point.

And, again:

The United States can supply men, money, and equipment. She has over 100,000,000 people; she cannot be attacked by the armies of the enemy on her own soil; she has unlimited resources; her supply of men can be 12,000,000, if necessary; her supply of money can be boundless, and there is no nation on earth that can excel her in organization for equipment.

And, again:

Never since the War of the Revolution had a British flag been hoisted on an American official building till last spring, and never had the same friendly compliment been paid to the American flag in England. But now they have waved together over Washington's tomb and over the House of Commons.

The Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, praises the work of the Society of Pilgrims, the formation of the American Officers' Club in Lord Leconfield's house in London, with His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught as president. Then this master publicist plainly states:

It should also be remembered that it was the Pilgrims' Society, under the fine chairmanship of Mr. Harry Brittain, which took charge of the Honorable James M. Beck when he visited England in 1916, and gave him so good a chance to do great work for the cause of unity between the two nations.

Continuing the quotation:

I am glad and proud to think that I had something to do with these arrangements which resulted in the Pilgrims taking Mr. Beck into their charge.

Now, Mr. President, I have stated that the Pierian springs were poisoned with propaganda. The distinguished English writer states respecting the Revolutionary War:

It is true that George III endeavored to impose upon the American people the Stamp Act, just as the Kings of France and Spain and Holland had imposed upon their colonies impositions for revenue, but it should not be forgotten by any American that King George III failed not only in America but in Great Britain, his own country.

And again:

There was as great a fight in the British Parliament over the American war as there was in America itself on the field of battle.

And then:

* * * the leaders of the opposition to King George in the British House of Commons were eager to give to the United States, as she was given in 1783, a status as a nation and not a province on the seacoast. The United States was given the Northwest Territory and the basin of the Ohio River to the Mississippi, so making possible the wonderful extension of power which has given to the American national life 48 States instead of the 13 which fought King George.

All of which I suppose means, in the estimation of this English writer, that except for the gracious attitude of Great Britain we never could have been a state of more than 13 colonies. That is most refreshing information.

There follows the distortion of every page of American history, from the beginning of the Revolutionary War through the War of 1812, with insult after insult to our nationality as we are led to believe we are still colonies of Great Britain, recipients of her bounty, properly fighting side by side with her on the battlefields of Europe, still absolutely dependent upon her friendship in order to live.

But that is not all. Twenty years ago the master publicist, the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert, asserted that after the war the two most democratic nations on earth, the two most advanced in civilization and enterprise, would be working hand in hand for the political good of all the world.

In the concluding paragraphs the propaganda expert introduces us to Japan in the following language:

I was in the United States when all the great missions of the Allies arrived—Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, Belgium, and now Japan. And now Japan! I emphasize these words because east and west in the United States, in San Francisco, in New York, and Washington, I had found until very lately the most consuming distrust of the government at Tokio and the people of Japan. It is, however, comforting to think that this mission of friendship from Japan is the direct result of the Zimmerman note. Whatever Japan's far purposes may be—laying aside all other considerations—it pays her better to be the friend of the Allies than the friend of Germany. I say it pays her better only because there are those who think that Japan in the politics of the world is out for gain. What could she gain by becoming the enemy of the United States, and, therefore, the enemy of England? Because, let this be understood, Japan knows her treaty of alliance with Great Britain does not include the possibility of war with the United States on the part of this oriental power. If Japan occupied the Pacific coast, her first immediate foe would be Great Britain, because British Columbia is on the Pacific coast, and Great Britain could not permit Japan or any other nation, except the United States, to seize or hold any portion of that littoral.

I believe that the anxieties of America have not been well based. I believe that the Japanese nation is as friendly to the United States as she is to Great Britain; and I also believe that, even on the lowest grounds of material benefit, Japan is true to her friendship with Great Britain and the Allies in this war. Far more dangerous is the German menace against the United States than the Japanese menace. And it must not be forgotten that the American Navy, whatever it is, exists today because Mr. William C. Whitney, the Secretary of the Navy in Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet, saw in German commercial invasion of South America a peril to the United States.

Back to President Cleveland's time we go. It seems that we then had our first knowledge of the peril to the United States from German invasion of South America. Evidently we long since have forgotten that, until this very year, when we are suddenly made to be aware again of a tremendous German invasion of South America with which the United States will have to contend.

Returning now to Sir Gilbert's book, I quote further:

What the United States will do in this war is being shown from day to day—and this thing is sure, that even the German-American no longer believes that Germany is fighting a war of defense; but rather that she precipitated the war, and is only "defending" herself because she failed in her first enterprise. I do not know to what extent the activity of the United States will expand, but I do know that if the war continues for another year the pinch of administration and losses in the field will stiffen the backs of the American people to the greatest effort that has ever been made in the history of the world.

I commend to the study of the Members of the Senate the audacious representations of a foreign propagandist who tells us frankly how under his direction, in 6 months, through publicity, the mind of America was swung from neutrality into the passion for war.

Some Senators stand here today, Mr. President, and ask, "What of it? Why worry? Why be concerned? Have we not here in Congress the last word in declaring war?"

Mr. President, I desire next to speak of what we all should know—namely, the type of lie and falsehood circulated throughout America 20 years ago, to change our attitude from one of peace to one of war. I will save time by merely enumerating the materials from which wars are made.

First, let it be understood that falsehood is a recognized weapon of warfare, deliberately used in every nation to deceive its own people, to attract neutrals, and to misinform an enemy. In our preparation for national defense, I warn that it is the habit of modern nations to prepare the people psychologically for the use of the arms and munitions which must be called into play on one side or another through the wiles of European diplomacy.

Twenty-eight years ago, in 1911, on March 8, in the House of Commons, Mr. McKinnon Wood, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, absolutely denied any secret treaty existed between England and France. That was on March 8. I refer to the book, Falsehood in Wartime, by Ponsonby, page 32.

On November 27, 1911, the same year, Sir Edward Grey admitted there were secret articles of agreement in 1904, but no other secret engagements. He denied emphatically that France and England had any secret engagement whatsoever.

As late as 1913, Lord Hugh Cecil charged in the House of Commons:

There is a very general belief that this country is under an obligation, not a treaty obligation, but an obligation arising owing to an assurance given by the ministry in the course of diplomatic negotiations, to send a very large force out of this country to operate in Europe.

Mr. Asquith answered out of the House of Commons with the words:

I ought to say that it is not true.

On March 24, 1913, Mr. Asquith assured the House of Commons that—

* * * If war arises between European powers, there are no unpublished agreements which will restrict or hamper the freedom of the Government or of Parliament to decide whether or not Great Britain should participate in a war.

On August 3, 1914, the day war broke out, Sir Edward Grey stated in the House of Commons:

I have assured the House, and the Prime Minister has assured the House more than once, that if any crisis such as this arose we should come before the House of Commons and be able to say to the House that it was free to decide what the attitude of the House should be; that we have no secret engagement which we should spring upon the House and tell the House that because we had entered upon that engagement there was an obligation of honor on the country.

And then 3 days later, on August 6, 1914, Lord Lansdowne, in the House of Lords, after referring to "treaty obligations and those other obligations which are not less sacred because they are not embodied in signed and sealed documents," said:

Under the one category fall our treaty obligations to Belgium. * * * To the other category belong our obligations to France—obligations of honor which have grown up in consequence of the close intimacy by which the two nations have been united during the last few years.

Then, on August 7, 1918, Lloyd George stated in the House of Commons:

We had a compact with France that if she were wantonly attacked the United Kingdom would go to her support. * * *

There was no compact as to what force we should bring into the arena. * * * Whatever arrangements we come to, I think history will show that we have more than kept faith.

On July 5, 1919, Marshal Joffre, before a Paris commission, stated:

The intervention of England in the war had been anticipated. A military convention existed with England which could not be divulged, as it bore a secret character. We relied upon six English divisions and upon the assistance of the Belgians.

On July 18, 1918, Mr. Bonar Law stated in the House of Commons:

It has been said—and I think it is very likely true—that if Germany had known for certain that Great Britain would have taken part in the war, the war would never have occurred.

On February 8, 1922, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, in the House of Commons, stated:

We found ourselves on a certain Monday listening to a speech by Lord Grey at this box which brought us face to face with war and upon which followed our declaration. That was the first public notification to the country or to anyone by the government of the day, of the position of the British Government, and of the obligations which it had assumed. * * * Was the House of Commons free to decide? Relying upon the arrangements made between the two Governments, the French coast was undefended—I am not speaking of Belgium but of France. There had been the closest negotiations and arrangements between our two Governments and our two staffs. There was not a word on paper binding this country, but in honor it was bound as it had never been bound before—I do not say wrongfully; I think rightly.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR. It should not have been secret.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I agree. That is my whole point, and I am coming to it. Can we ever be indifferent to the French frontier or to the fortunes of France? A friendly power in possession of the channel ports is a British interest, treaty or no treaty. * * * Suppose that engagement had been made publicly in the light of day. Suppose it had been laid before this House and approved by this House, might not the events of those August days have been different? * * * If we had had that, if our obligations had been known and definite, it is at least possible, and I think it is probable, that war would have been avoided in 1914.

Could these things happen again? Of course they could, with so much depending upon what men will choose as our frontier, upon what men may choose to make our foreign policy.

Mr. President, "when I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things."

I recommend the reading of Falsehood in Wartime, by Arthur Ponsonby, M. P., who not only gives us within the first 42 pages of his pamphlet the quotations I have just uttered but continues to show the content of the lying campaigns of propaganda calculated to inflame a people to war.

Mr. President, I say, of course, Congress has the power to declare war; but I say that the mind of Congress is not free when subtle propaganda is already at work in this country, as it was some 20 years ago, to change us from a peace-loving people to a people tutored in the calculated hatred of nations with which we are at peace. I repeat a certain Christmas message well within the memory of all of us:

The people of the United States do not like the Government of Japan; the people of the United States do not like the Government of Germany; the people of the United States do not like the Government of Italy.

From this time on it can easily be only the repetition of history. If war should break out in Europe, it will be because America will say the word "go," and influences leading to the "go" are already at work. Much the same calculating press that worked under the direction of the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, has been at work.

We have the word of modern British statesmen that secret treaties caused the World War. The totalitarian states are being branded "totalitarian," and we are branding the world's two greatest modern empires as "democracies." We are being led as lambs to slaughter by others or by ourselves.

The key to our situation, in my humble opinion, is the stabilization fund, which for over 5 years has linked our Treasury with those of Great Britain and France. From that financial link there has grown up a relationship as secret, as implied, as confidential as to require no more treaty to sanction it than England and France had in 1911, 1912, 1913, and on August 3, 1914, when the statesmen of England denied before Parliament and the Cabinet that any alliance existed.

Out of those secret understandings under which the French franc is supported on the very eve of Hitler's negotiations with Mussolini the so-called democracies of England and France are wedded to our American Treasury to the point where the Treasury supersedes the Secretary of State in the diplomatic negotiations among sovereign powers; to the point where the Treasury supersedes the Senate in its treaty-making power; and to the point, I fear, where the Treasury will supersede the Congress of the United States not in the formal declaration of war but in commitments carrying with them inevitably the threat of war.

Under these commitments war propaganda can start. A successor to the Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, can be appointed here or abroad. The shibboleths of "democracy" on the one side and "totalitarian states" on the other will ring forth. The fact that Italy and Japan were our associates in the last war "to make the world safe for democracy" will be forgotten. Then will come an army of propagandists recruited from college professors, publicists, writers, and the press. Then will be let loose studied personal correspondence, prostituted literature, speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens on the pay roll, possibly, of foreign nations.

In the work, Breaking the Silence, by Gaffney, at page 9, I find that on August 5, 1918, Lief Jones, member of Parliament, stated:

America was perhaps best done, and that was due to the fact that Sir Gilbert Parker, a former member of this house, was responsible for a great deal of correspondence to America long before America intervened in the war, and at a time when it was very important that we should make Americans understand our position (p. 9).

On March 11, 1918, in the British House of Commons, Mr. A. Mason, M. P., stated:

Officers of the Northcliffe mission were established in New York. The commission was recruited by Lord Northcliffe from his own offices at home, and it was arranged that a supply of news should be furnished the American press (p. 10).

In an article in Foreign Affairs, Mr. Mason further stated that the Northcliffe mission was composed of "2,000 persons or more." Mr. Frank Anstey, member of the Australian Press Commission on the Western Front, who wrote Red Europe, states that it was admitted in the House of Commons that British publicity agents in the United States numbered 4,500. To work upon whom? Upon Congress, that had the exclusive power to declare war? No; not for a moment.

To quote further from the London journal, Foreign Affairs, on November 7, 1918—4 days before the armistice—Colonel Hamersly, a member of Parliament, states:

To my mind, an end is put to the Ministry of Information; and if activities are withdrawn from America, it will be not short of a calamity to this country (pp. 10-11).

In other words, there was the thought that they ought to continue their press-agent activities in America for all time.

George Demartial, French author, officer of the Legion of Honor, has stated:

What is new is the treachery by which the Entente powers disguised their egoistic objects under the pretense of saving right, liberty, and civilization from German "barbarism," and collected for that purpose the most absurd and vile lies which have ever been known. What was particularly ignoble was to see the intellectual elite, the princes of journalism, of letters, and of the universities, almost without exception, make themselves the unworthy hawkers of this filth (p. 284).

Mr. President, I throw two historic paragraphs in counter distinction. The first is David Lloyd George, writing 8 months before the war, on January 1, 1914, in the Daily Chronicle:

The German Army is vital, not merely to the existence of the German Empire, but to the very life and independence of the nation itself surrounded as Germany is by other nations, each of which possesses armies about as powerful as her own. We forget that, while we insist upon a 60-percent superiority so far as our naval strength is concerned over Germany being essential to guarantee the integrity of our own shores, Germany herself has nothing like that superiority over France alone, and she has, of course, in addition to reckon with Russia on her eastern frontier. Germany has nothing which approximates to a two-power standard (p. 287).

Robert Lansing, Wilson's Secretary of State, insolently replied to the peace message of His Holiness Pope Benedict XV in the following language in 1917:

The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and power of a vast military establishment controlled by an irresponsible government, which having secretly planned to dominate the world proceeded to carry the plan out without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established practices and long-cherished principles of international action and honor; which chose its own time for the war; delivered its blow fiercely and suddenly; stopped at no barrier whether of law or of mercy; swept a whole continent within the tide of blood—not the blood of soldiers only, but the blood of innocent women and children also, and the helpless poor (p. 286).

Mr. President, I say frankly I believe we are on the road to war. We are not observing "good faith and justice toward all nations," nor are we "cultivating peace and harmony with all." This is Washington's advice. We are not avoiding "inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others."

In our "passionate attachment" for the so-called democracies of the Old World, against the advice of Washington, we facilitate the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists.

We are not protecting ourselves against "the insidious works of foreign influence."

We are not recognizing that "Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation."

We are "quitting our own to stand on foreign ground," and that ground must be where the President of the United States may choose to establish our frontier.

Mr. President, we must be fast returning to the principles laid down so well by Washington, to the principle of isolation from war and from entangling foreign alliances. A foreign policy being what it is, Congress will do well to insist upon having closer knowledge of what that policy is, lest it find itself some day with a challenge for a declaration of war on its hands, with no escapement from it for the simple reason that we did not know what was going on that shaped the challenge which finally came to the Congress.

Mr. President, I return now for a moment to the thesis laid down by my critic on Wednesday last. Of course Congress has the power to declare war; of course the Constitution so provides; of course every schoolboy knows it; but what is Congress? It is made up of 531 human beings, subject to the same psychological laws as are any other 531 human beings in the world. Suggestion and not argument motivates the mass of mankind. Into the minds of the people of America, including most of the 531, subtle, insidious propaganda will start to plant the seed of lie and error and falsehood. The known truth will be impugned.

Not the crystal but the lamp of experience should enlighten us to fear the steps which now may be chosen. First, the people will be calculatingly taught to hate the Government of Germany, to hate the Government of Italy, to hate the Government of Japan. Then there may be regimented the publicists of foreign lands to prostitute the pedants of America, as they falsify history, and indoctrinate error into the masses of the people. That error will be quickly reflected in a matter of months on many of us in this very body.

Perhaps a first work will be to have us build our military machine ready for the service of foreigners.

The second work will be to have us secretly trade and deal with a foreign empire.

The third will be to ask us to offend Japan by an air base at Guam.

The fourth will be to continue the stabilization fund so that men may strengthen "democracies" and flout so-called dictatorship on the Continent of Europe.

The fifth will be the direction of foreign credits into the channels of politically orthodox traders.

Then will come the open insults to powers now friendly and the cheap machinations calculated to secure insults to our flag or to our citizens.

Following this, the work will merely be a duplication of two decades ago.

How can we, as so many do, close our eyes to experience? How can we, and why do we, sometimes ignore as "flippant" and "without foundation" the fact that there are persons and influences that do control the destinies of nations, including ours, to a point where they may and do dictate war? How can men shut their eyes to the story related here yesterday by the eloquent Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the story of change, change, change by those who shape our foreign policy, the change being constantly one away from isolation from war and toward the fire, just to see how close we can get to it without being burned?

Men—Americans of influence, administration leaders—stand upon our shore making faces and calling names, the target being a foreign power or powers. The administration shifts its ambassadors about in a manner which, whether or not intended, causes other nations to look upon the act as unfriendly and then to retaliate. Foreign-policy makers rise and request new powers of Congress, powers to quarantine those whom the policy makers do not like, powers that will let them invoke sanctions. Again, these leaders and policy shapers seek power to "pick the aggressor" and the further power to operate upon the found aggressor, yet all the while insisting that such powers be granted by Congress in the name of neutrality. And in the face of all this, others ask and, I presume, will continue to ask: What has that got to do with it all? We have still the power in Congress to declare war.

There are things that have been said again and again. The welfare of our country requires that some things be repeated often. So now I say again what I have said before:

There is a greater need today for calm, clear thinking about our country's relationship to the remainder of the world than on any other subject. In the event that the dreaded second world war should come, what we do now is far more crucial than what we do after the conflict commences. If we are to be spared the agony and devastation of participation in another war, the policies now being formulated will achieve that merciful end. If we are to be plunged into that war, it will be likewise because of what is done now.

This is so clearly demonstrated in retrospect by the years from 1914 to 1917 that it should require no argument. Those years are a story of a nation drifting into deepening entanglements with a European conflict with which it had originally little direct concern and finally into that struggle. No single action was responsible for American involvement in the World War. Rather, it was the cumulative force of a long series of day-by-day actions, each establishing precedents for those that were to follow and each bringing involvement closer.

With that frightful experience still fresh in our minds, it is amazing that so many persons, in high and low places, should forget the lesson of 1914 to 1917. Yet today that lesson has been forgotten by the very men and women who best should remember it. Steps are being taken, policies are being inaugurated, precedents established today that in large degree parallel the "road to war" which America trod only a little more than 20 years ago.

In the thunder of angry and emotional oratory—amidst high-sounding but vague words which make for confusion—between seemingly contradictory policies, punctuated by incidents of official secrecy—all of which constitute the backdrop of the Washington scene today—it appears that this country has no foreign policy, except that of drift and day-to-day expediency divorced from realism.

Yet closer examination of the words and deeds of our Chief Executive in the field of foreign affairs reveals a thread of policy which needs to be brought out into the strong sunlight of day. At times this policy is declared in generalities—at other times it is intimated. Nevertheless it has become sufficiently clear as to cause alarm and to demand a frank discussion of its soundness and its implications.

This policy is based on the belief—fallacious and erroneous, in my opinion—that if there is another general war in Europe the involvement of this country in that conflict is inevitable—that there is nothing we can do—no step that we can take—that will save us from being sucked into such a war. This is a counsel of despair, generated by emotion and hysteria, without a basis of either fact or realistic appreciation of world affairs.

Yet it is on the acceptance of this belief that there is predicated the contention that America must give aid and support to the democracies of Europe in difficulties with which we have no concern. It is the basis for the contention that this country should not undertake to observe a rigid neutrality but should take sides in words and deed among the quarreling nations of Europe and Asia.

In other words, our policy appears to be that since our involvement in another war is inevitable, then we should do all in our power now to assist and support nations which in a future conflict may be our allies in order to prevent such a war. Since this proposition is predicated on a theory that we are doomed to be participants in another war, whether we like it or not, it is argued that by pursuing a policy of cooperation and collaboration with certain European nations we are not running any risk which does not now confront us.

Such was the implication of President Roosevelt's Chicago speech of October 1937 in which he pleaded for the support of this country in a quarantine of the so-called aggressor nations of the world. More clearly it was the implication of the President's message to Congress last month. In that address the President undertook to arouse the people of this country to a spirit of a holy war by an appeal to our desire to worship God according to the dictates of our conscience.

"Storms from abroad," asserted the President, "directly challenge three institutions indispensable to Americans now, as always. The first is religion. It is the source of the other two—democracy and international good faith."

Having thus laid down his theme, the President continued by saying:

There comes a time in the affairs of men when they must prepare to defend not their homes alone but the tenets of faith and humanity on which their churches, their governments, and their very civilization are founded. The defense of religion, of democracy, and of good faith among nations is all the same fight. To save one we must now make up our minds to save all.

I deny emphatically that religious freedom in this country will be imperiled by whatever happens abroad. I deny that our democracy or our civilization is threatened by developments abroad so long as we keep ourselves free from involvement in the quarrels of Europe. I assert with confidence that the greatest threat to American democracy is to be found in policies which ultimately will have the effect of making us participants in the quarrels of Europe and in any war which should break out.

Already do we find our leadership worked to a point where it permits no criticism of its foreign policy, if any. Critics of that policy are cast aside as "boobs" or "liars," and are being referred to as pro-Fascists, prompted by partisan prejudices. Let anyone think I am thus prompted when I declare my views concerning the direction which the President is pursuing, permit me to quote from an editorial commenting on the President's message to Congress which recently appeared in the Christian Century, a nondenominational religious periodical with a national circulation:

Here, we do not hesitate to say, is the most misleading and dangerous appeal made to the American people by a Chief Executive in the history of the Republic—misleading because the entire argument rests on the premise of an impending attack by the totalitarian states on the democracies of this hemisphere. Such a prospect, except to a fevered imagination, is fantastic. Not even the military and naval men, with all their clamor for more armaments, believe there is the slightest danger of such an invasion in any perceivable future. A rudimentary knowledge of the difficulties in which Hitler and Mussolini are involved in Europe, or of the trouble which the Japanese are having in trying to chew what they have already bitten off in China, should set at rest fear of an impending attack either on this Nation or on the other American Republics.

This editorial said of the President's message—

But this appeal—

not only rests on a fictitious premise, it is dangerous—diabolically dangerous—in its attempt to rouse religious passion. The President has done this deliberately, with his eyes open, and as a means of destroying the sober, calm judgment of the American people. Knowing that there would be opposition to the gigantic armament program which he desires, he has deliberately sought to divert the whole matter out of the realm of rational discussion into a realm of emotional ferment where men can be swayed to impulsive action by being frightened with the cry, "Your religion is at stake!"

Of course, it is fantastic, as this editor wrote, to say that this country is in danger of an impending attack abroad. And it is just as fantastic to contend that this country cannot keep out of another war if its people are determined to do so and if our Government pursues a course of caution and wisdom.

We now know that had our people been alive to the danger confronting them at the beginning of the World War, that we could have avoided actions which subsequently led to our involvement in that conflict. We now know that we fought in vain to make the world safe for democracy and that that high ideal has become a term of mockery.

We now also know that trade in munitions of war and the loans we made to the Allies were the first fatal steps along the road which led this country into the World War. Those events marked the turning of the road away from the first neutrality proclamation of President Wilson in which he warned the country against taking sides. If only President Wilson had adhered to and had given practical application to that declaration, we could have escaped participation in the conflict.

The knowledge of what happened between 1914 and 1917 should forearm us against the dangers which overwhelmed us in those earlier years. Because of that experience we should now be able to steer a course that would avoid the whirlpools which sucked us into war some 20 years ago. Add to that realistic appreciation that those who threaten war in Europe are facing eastward and not toward the west and us.

These factors, along with our geographic isolation, makes it ridiculous to talk about this Nation facing an impending threat, either of actual invasion or to its institutions from beyond our borders, unless we deliberately ally ourselves with the affairs of Europe. It must be obvious that participation in another war by this country would mean the end of those American institutions of liberty and freedom for which we now are being urged to fight.

Despite the lessons of our experience, we now find the President insisting that we must cooperate economically with one group of nations threatened with war while he heaps reproaches and odium on the opposing group of nations. More amazingly, he invokes the need of providing employment for our jobless as one reason for such cooperation, as he did in justification of his promotion of secret assistance given France in the purchase of airplanes in this country. I express my amazement advisedly, because none has stated the danger involved in such action more cogently than did President Roosevelt less than 3 years ago in an address at Chautauqua, N. Y.

PROFIT FROM WAR MOVES PRESIDENT

If war should break out again in another continent—

The President said on that occasion—

let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

They would tell you—and unfortunately their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this or that and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

And on that day also, President Roosevelt declared that—

We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war, and, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "No" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war.

Great, indeed, is the distance which Mr. Roosevelt has traveled from the day he made that address to his recent press conference in which he defended cooperation with France in the purchase of airplanes here as a means of putting people to work in idle factories.

Yes, Mr. President; Congress still has the power to declare war. So what? The truth is that as great a power as ours, or greater, is the power of conducting the foreign policy of a nation. That power has made and that power can make it impossible for a Congress to do other than declare war. Step by step can those conducting our foreign relationship take us to the gates where there is no alternative to a declaration of war. How much better it would be that we all acknowledge this simple truth! How much better than that we turn our back upon experience, and bring the lesson of truth again in its horrible form!

Yes, Mr. President; there are men, there are influences in this country who may dictate war, and bring affairs to a point where other nations may accept the evidence as the signal to "go," knowing that our country can be counted upon to fall in line and lend the assistance essential to the conduct of a war; and it is not palaver to say so. It is not an irresponsible or careless declaration. It is not flippant, loose, prejudiced or unsubstantial talk. It is truth. Smear it over, cover it up if you can, but it is still truth here to stay for those who will but be realistic. Deny it if you will, and wait for the mandates of appetite and secret understandings, that become known only too late, to lead us to that day when honor—God save us—will be called upon to make good with the blood of our youth the mistakes and the darings of diplomats and foreign-policy makers and conductors.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President and Senators, the very distinguished junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye] has taken 3 or 4 hours in attempting to answer one simple, elemental, and serious question propounded by the junior Senator from Illinois in this debate upon what is probably the most important question which will come before the United States during the present session. That question is simply this: Who in these United States of America is going to give the word "go" before Europe takes up arms and plunges that continent into a bloody and ghastly war? That question embodies a statement that was made in debate upon this floor by the junior Senator from North Dakota, and that is the question I should like to have answered.

Mr. President, long have I waited for the answer in the course of the debate. Long have other Senators waited for the junior Senator from North Dakota to give some intimation by some word somewhere along the line in his debate as to what he meant by that unusual statement; and anxiously, I contend, are peace-loving citizens of America who believe honestly in peace on earth and good will to men waiting for the Senator from North Dakota to let them in on that secret.

During the course of the debate on this bill we have heard much about secrecy in connection with various governmental transactions during the last few months; but I undertake to say that the greatest secret of all still remains and lies within the breast of the junior Senator from North Dakota with respect to the statement he made. Where is the man in this country, where is the group of men, who at this moment hold the key and are anxious or only waiting to say the word "go" before Europe is embroiled in another holocaust of war? The junior Senator from North Dakota could talk from now until doomsday and he would utterly fail to give the answer, because he does not know. He has no concrete information along that line.

Basing his entire case for such an unwarranted and, I say, sensational utterance in this particular time in the affairs of our great country, as well as of the world, he quotes copiously from writers in France and England and America, but not a word fell from his lips indicating that a single man in this legislative Hall or in the legislative Hall of the other branch of Congress, not a man in the executive branch of the Government, not a man in the judicial branch of the Government, not a single individual in the business world made that statement.

Mr. President, I sincerely sympathize with the junior Senator from North Dakota—and I say that in the best of spirit—in his laborious effort, his futile effort, in attempting to explain and qualify this bold and sensational announcement. I do not blame him for taking three hours and a half of the Senate's time in attempting to explain the remark. He will be using much time in the future, in my humble opinion, in explaining to sincere and honest and patriotic and peace-loving Americans the fantastic and most unusual conclusion he reached through what I contend to be a mysterious realm of conjecture and speculation.

I am reminded of a story I should like to recount, then I will close what I have to say with respect to my part in this debate. I did not expect to speak upon the floor of the Senate for a long time, but when that statement was made, as one who cherishes my America and the institutions she represents probably better than anything in this life, at least one who cherishes them to the point that when I think of what America has done for me it warms the cockles of my heart, I could not, as a United States Senator, and as a citizen of Illinois, stand idly by without making the protest I have uttered. I have protested in the best of faith, not intending in any way to condemn or criticize, but only stating what I believed to be for the best interests of this great country of ours and the peace-loving people who live within its borders.

Mr. President, I am a veteran of the late war and I believe I understand something about war. As I stated yesterday—and I do not change my position—I do not disagree in great measure with many things which are now believed by the Members of the United States Senate, but I will never believe that on the doorstep of America rests the sole responsibility for any war which may take place in Europe next spring, or next summer, or the following year.

I wonder why the junior Senator from North Dakota limited the period to this spring, or next summer, or next year. That seems strange to me.

When I first engaged in the practice of law in the State of Illinois, after I had received from the supreme court of my State the right to practice, I went into the little city of Havana, a city of only 5,000 people. I admit that I did not know what it was all about at that time, and sometimes when I listen to some statements or read some articles I still wonder whether I am not yet in the same stage that I was when I first started to practice law. I then went to a very learned judge, a very polished man, a man who was honest and sincere, and I said to him, "Your Honor, I am just a new lawyer in this community. I have hung up my shingle on Main Street to practice law. Last night this question presented itself to me: If a case came to me and I had a great deal of evidence on my side but very little law, what would I do?" The judge immediately replied, "Young man, you should plead the evidence." I said, "Yes; but this is another paradoxical situation. If I had the law or a part of the law but very little evidence on my side, then what should I do?" The judge said, "Under those circumstances you should plead the law." "But," I said, "if I had no law and no evidence, what then should I do?" He said, "Then, young man, you should plead ancient history."

I say that the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye], having nothing upon one side or the other, has attempted to plead his case and convince Senators that he is right with a recital of much ancient history.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am in favor of adequate national defense. The extent of preparedness should be in proportion to need, not in proportion to the hysterical fears of the fearful, or the greed of armament makers, or the natural ambitions of Army and Navy officers.

Before the United States rushes into a huge armament program, running into the billions of dollars annually for years to come, several things should be considered.

Congress should determine a basic defense program. The basic alternatives are these: First, is the United States to build a navy for the purpose of defending the United States and helping to defend the Western Hemisphere against aggression; or, second, is the United States to build a navy for the purpose of taking sides and attempting to determine the results of an Old World war over boundaries and trade territories?

I will support whatever is needed for national defense, but I am opposed to constructing a navy, to building up an air force, for the purpose of policing Europe and Asia. Attempting to settle Old World boundaries and disputes based on hatreds and misunderstandings that go back over many centuries is not the job of the United States.

Our State Department may feel that it is within the province of the United States to have understandings or even agreements with Old World powers. Our President may feel that the United States has a destiny to work out in world affairs and that he is the agent of destiny to help settle world affairs.

But I do not feel that way about it at all. We won our freedom from European disputes and Europe's wars when we freed ourselves from England at the close of the eighteenth century.

Our experience in the World War, when we went forth to make the world safe for democracy, was not such as to encourage the destiny complex. And after the war was over, the people of the United States were wise enough to insist that we not tie ourselves up in any European agreements.

We won our freedom from Europe the second time when the United States Senate refused to enter the League of Nations. We should keep that freedom. It is worth keeping.

Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to entering into an armament race based on participation in the affairs of Europe and Asia. And I believe that is the feeling of the great majority of the people of the United States.

The world is spending this year $20,000,000,000 in preparations for war. If the United States adopts the policy of building a $5,000,000,000 super-Navy and 10,000 airplanes, the world will know that the United States expects to take part in Old World disputes. No other possible interpretation can be placed by outsiders upon a program that will give the United States a much larger Navy and air force than is needed for defense purposes.

Just so soon as this policy is adopted, every other nation will either feel compelled, or will use the United States as an excuse, to build up a still larger and stronger army and navy. The munitions makers, whose profits this year are running into the millions, will assist in such programs. Then when the other nations increase their armament expenditures, their preparations for war, it will be up to the United States to enlarge its program.

Our responsibility to the world is to discourage war and preparations for war, not to encourage them. One way to do that is to shut off the profits from war and do what we can to stop the traffic in war supplies the world over. The making of war supplies is now the most profitable business in this country. The manufacture of munitions is making millionaires every year.

The United States program should be a program of defense—adequate defense—of the United States, and sufficient to help defend the Western Hemisphere from Old World aggression. I am willing to go the limit that is necessary for that kind of a defense program.

If we keep our noses out of other nations' affairs and do not mix in their quarrels, there is not much chance that any European nation, even the war-mad dictatorships, will attempt to cross the Atlantic and attack the United States or any other American republic. Certainly England and France will not do it. Germany and Italy already have their hands full.

The fact is that this country is not threatened by invasion and, if we mind our own business, we should not be. Hence the very most we need in the way of armament is sufficient for our defense.

That means that the United States does not need to spend much more than already is authorized for the Army and the Navy, in order to be thoroughly prepared to defend itself. I am in favor of cutting down the number of new airplanes to 5,500 as proposed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. President, the Government or the Congress should not be able to plunge this Nation into war without consulting the people who have to do the fighting and pay the bill. I do not think any small group of men should have that power, except when this Nation is attacked or directly threatened with attack. If we are going to increase our armament, as the administration is now advocating, I think it is doubly necessary that the people take precautions which will prevent intemperate action, dictated by hysteria or inspired by political or other expediency.

That is why I am in favor of the enactment of an amendment to the Constitution providing that except in case our Nation is attacked or threatened with attack, the President and the Congress cannot engage in a foreign war or formally declare war on another nation, without submitting the question to a vote of the people. The people have a right to decide for themselves whether they want to go into a war. No President, no Congress, should have the right to make the decision for them.

I am convinced that a majority of the common people of our country favor a constitutional amendment which will give them the right to decide for themselves whether they want to engage in war. I was glad to join with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. FA FOLLETTE], the Senators from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER and Mr. NYE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and other Members of the Senate in the introduction of a referendum resolution.

Mr. President, I have received hundreds and hundreds of letters from people all over our country telling me that is how they feel about the matter. I am with them 100 percent, and I will support such an amendment in Congress.

Let me refer to another matter. Our neutrality law should be reenacted and should be strengthened instead of weakened as some now propose. It will help keep us out of war if it is properly enforced; and it should be enforced. I am in favor of putting more teeth in it. We must stop selling war supplies to Japan or any other country engaged in war.

I believe profit should be taken out of war and out of preparation for war. If munitions makers were not permitted to make any profit we would not hear them talking so loudly of the need for a vast armament effort in this country right now.

I am against secret alliances of any kind. The cloud of secrecy surrounding the negotiations with foreign countries both with respect to foreign policy and the sale of airplanes, unfortunately has had the effect of creating suspicion in the public mind. I think it is time to renew the old doctrine of "open covenants openly arrived at" in all dealings with foreign governments.

In conclusion let me say that I protest, with all the power I possess, against sacrificing Americans to settle foreign difficulties not our own. I shall oppose sending American boys across the seas to take part in foreign wars.

I am opposed to any program which undertakes to make the United States the policeman of the world.

I am in favor of making America impregnable to attack by any nation, but there is no reason in the world for extending our line of defense over 6,000 miles into the Pacific. I am against building fortifications at Guam.

The people of the United States want no war with anyone, and I do not believe there is any country in the world which wants a war with the United States. We want to be fully prepared to protect ourselves against any invasion or attack, but there is no reason why we should go around with a chip on our shoulder inviting a fight with some other country.

I shall continue to oppose wild-eyed armament programs. Let us keep our heads, mind our own business, and stay out of the quarrels and controversies of other nations.

DAVID R. THOMPSON AND RALPH S. WARNER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 316) to authorize and direct the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to reappoint David R. Thompson and Ralph S. Warner as members of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. KING, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3791) to provide more effectively for the national defense by carrying out the recommendations of the President in his message of January 12, 1939, to the Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I am sure that all those who listened yesterday to the great speech of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] were impressed by its logic and force. I was deeply impressed; and because of that fact and because I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, which presented the bill now under discussion, I feel impelled to make some brief observations on the subject.

It may be that the first lines of our national defense are in the islands of the seas surrounding our country and in its Territorial and insular possessions; and under the obligations imposed upon us by the reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine, it may be necessary for us to maintain a navy, an army, and an air force more numerous and more powerful and of a different type than if we confined our purpose to the protection of our homeland and continental possessions. However, I shall for the present confine my remarks to a consideration of necessary and adequate military defense of the United States, Alaska, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal.

The sole question, then, is, What is the measure of the requirements for that purpose? I repeat, Mr. President, that, in my opinion, the sole question before the Senate is, What is the measure of the requirements for the adequate protection of our homeland? Not being a military man, I must look to our military experts for the answer to that question.

From the testimony taken before the Military Affairs Committee, it is apparent that certain undesirable conditions exist and that certain things should be done by us as prudent managers of national affairs. The testimony adduced demonstrates that our present Army is equipped with arms of various kinds which are now obsolete. Most of this equipment was on hand at the close of the World War, more than 20 years ago. The personnel of our Army is not sufficient to guarantee successful resistance to a sudden and unexpected attack by a first-class military power, especially an attack against the Panama Canal.

The program as outlined in the measure before us, House bill 3791, is designed to create an air force strictly and exclusively for defense. It is strictly a defensive force, so constituted and located as to provide for necessary air defenses of continental United States, the Panama Canal, Hawaii, and Alaska. The bases provided are merely those necessary to permit the air force created to be concentrated as rapidly as possible to meet any emergency which may confront this country.

The number of planes is not excessive. It is to be noted that of the maximum possible total of 6,000 planes called for, only a small number of them will be actively manned combat types, the actual number permitted being but 1,900. These 1,900 combat planes can be concentrated at any point in the United States if the bases called for in the bill are provided. This force of 1,900 planes is woefully small as compared to the tremendous numbers now being constructed in most of the principal foreign countries. Of the total number of planes provided for in the program only 3,300 combat, training, and miscellaneous planes will be manned and equipped at any time; the remainder are to be held as replacements for losses and to be utilized in the combat units as replacements so as to maintain a constant combat strength of only 1,900. These comparatively small figures themselves indicate that the air force proposed to be created is designed solely for the defense of the United States and is not to be built up for an aggressive war carried to foreign shores.

I am informed that Great Britain is increasing her air force personnel to total strength of 115,000 men; Germany has increased hers well beyond that figure. It is of interest to note that the total called for in this program is but 45,000 men for the entire air force of the United States Army.

This bill authorizes certain construction at the Panama Canal to house the personnel required there for the purpose of manning the seacoast defenses and the antiaircraft guns, which are now actually installed there but which completely lack crews to man them. The War Department tells us that if we want to have these guns operated we must first provide the quarters before sending additional men into that dangerous climate.

The bill also provides for what, to me, is one of the highly important considerations for the national defense, namely, the preparation of industry to meet the special demands of war production.

In my opinion, there is no issue here involving politics, nor are we dealing with foreign alliances or antagonisms. We do not question the motives of the householder who puts a lock on his door. By doing so he casts no reflection upon his good neighbors. He is but exercising prudent protection against possible lawlessness. This bill represents the considered judgment of our highest military authorities and is prompted solely by a desire to provide for the national defense. With that conviction, I shall vote for the passage of the measure.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. DANAHY. Mr. President and Senators, I do not know whether or not I shall break precedent if I direct attention for a few minutes to the bill before the Senate; but, as a neophyte, I should like to call special attention, first, to line 3, page 1, wherein we discover that the act approved June 24, 1936, is repealed.

Reference to the original act will disclose that there were then authorized to be built 2,320 serviceable fighting planes. General Arnold, testifying before the House Appropriations Committee, said that today the Army has only 879 fighting planes in actual service. We are now asked to authorize 6,000 serviceable airplanes.

A few short days ago Navy planes, seeking to return to Pensacola, found themselves enveloped in a fog. A number of those planes cruised about until their gasoline supply had been exhausted, and then dropped into the sea, with resulting loss of life, and loss of the equipment, and of the planes themselves. Those which were equipped with radio, and which could come in on a radio beam, found safety.

We hear, in connection with this bill, of the proposal to expend at least $300,000,000, and probably a great deal more, to carry out the authorization contained in the measure, but not a word with reference to the development of an adequate radiobeacon system.

Mr. President, right here in Washington there is Bolling Field. For some 18 or 20 years it has been in course of construction. At the present time it cannot possibly service more than 300 to 350 fighting planes. In due course I should like to know from some of the members of the Military Affairs Committee whether, as a concomitant of the plan proposed by the pending bill, we should not, first, take steps definitely and adequately to secure to these planes, if and when we have them, radio beams on which they may land and flying fields at which they can be serviced. We ought to have emergency flying fields at least every 100 miles apart within transverse ratio throughout the country in order to permit adequate service of these fighting airships.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank the able Senator for his timely statement. I think he is absolutely correct. I wish to call attention to certain great highways of Europe, which are now so constructed that by shutting off traffic they can furnish continuous landing fields across an entire nation. This we can also do in America by building transcontinental highways east and west and similar highways north and south.

I also should like to ask the Senator how many men lost their lives in the disaster to which he refers. Was not half a million dollars lost, and how many lives?

Mr. DANAHER. I have forgotten, I must say to the Senator, exactly how many lives were lost; but the Senator certainly is correct in the statement that we lost at least half a million dollars in equipment.

Mr. LUNDEEN. And yet we heard Senators on the floor of the United States Senate, I believe yesterday, who were more concerned about financing France and Britain, and financing Europe for war, than about taking care of the radios upon our own airships, which our own pilots and fliers are flying in stormy weather.

I am for the program which the Senator is bringing to our attention. Let us take care of America first in our fighting equipment and all other equipment.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the able Senator.

I desire to point out, Mr. President and Senators, that the President, in his message of January 12 to Congress, says:

It is proposed that $300,000,000 be appropriated for the purchase of several types of airplanes for the Army. This should provide a minimum increase of 3,000 planes, but it is hoped that orders placed on such a large scale will materially reduce the unit cost and actually provide many more planes.

In view of the fact that we are repealing the authorization for 2,320 planes, contained in the act of June 24, 1936, I assume that the number of 6,000 serviceable planes mentioned in line 9 is arrived at by regarding the President's recommendation with reference to the 3,000 planes, by allowing for the 2,320 planes previously authorized, and a differential which, I take it, will be a means of "jockeying" as to price, in order that there may be a unit bid which is fair and square so far as the Government and the taxpayers are concerned.

If there has been established a need for airplanes in this country, and if in fact there be a threat to the safety of our shores, certainly any number of planes, regardless of cost, must be authorized. But if in fact there be no need, and if, although in 1936 there were authorized 2,320 planes, we today have only 879 fighting planes, it seems to me reasonable to expect that we can properly take an authorized minimum; that we can year by year, as certain planes wear out and deteriorate, have a renewable and consequently up-to-date unit force of fighting planes; but, as a parallel, we can very properly take a considerable portion of the fund which the program as recommended by the committee would cost, and devote it to ground bases at which these airships could be serviced and on which they could land, and through the air their course could be directed from the radios to be established and the beacons to be set up.

I have no doubt that our able Army engineering corps can tell us at the proper moment, by virtue of their geodetic and other surveys, where the radio beacons should be located and where landing fields should be built. It seems to me that our committee might very properly take into account an adequate ground force as part of our program, and the development ultimately of a common-sense, worth-while defensive mechanism.

Senators will notice, if they will read the bill, that the only reference to hangars has to do with airships, free balloons, and captive balloons therein described. Yet General Arnold told the House Committee on Appropriations a few days ago that he would obviate the building of hangars because of the fact that they offer such a tremendous target for an enemy.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. CLARK of Missouri addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I have not examined the Senator's suggestion, but I am curious to know whether he has it in the form of an amendment. Has it been offered?

Mr. DANAHER. I have an amendment I desire to propose, but I have not as yet offered it. I understood the Senate would act first on committee amendments and after they were disposed of that I would be allowed to submit my amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest that the Senator present the amendment now and let it lie on the table and be printed for the information of Senators.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the able Senator. I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I desired to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he was under the impression that there was any limitation whatever in the bill, other than the limitation of 5,500 planes, as to number, included in the bill as it passed the House, and the limitation of 6,000 planes contained in the Senate committee amendment, and the limitation contained in the section having to do with the Panama Canal; in other words, whether the Senator is referring to the message of the President, having to do with the sum of $300,000,000 for the improvement of aviation, or the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], on the floor of the Senate a few days ago having to do with the sum of $170,000,000 for the purchase of new airplanes? I will say to the Senator that he will not find either provision in the pending bill. Neither is in the bill in the shape of a limitation, and there is no limitation whatever in the bill as to the number of airplanes to be purchased. There is nothing in the bill except a limitation by number alone, not as to amount. There is nothing in the bill whatever in the nature of a limitation, except by number, which would prevent the War Department's spending a billion or two billion dollars for the purchase of airplanes and sending up to the Congress a deficiency estimate to provide for the payment for the additional planes purchased. The only limitation in the bill has to do with the limitation of the number of planes—5,500 in the bill as it passed the House and 6,000 in the Senate committee amendment.

So far as the appropriation for ground service is concerned, only a little over half of the appropriation of $300,000,000 recommended in the President's message is to be spent for the purchase of new airplanes. The other $130,000,000 is to be spent for ground services and other items which go to make up the expenses of an aviation service, which to my mind completely explodes the contention of the majority of the committee that it is to the interest of the Government. If they can get more planes than they need for the same amount, they have not lost anything, because the initial purchase of the planes amounts to only about half, or a little more than half, of the initial cost of maintenance, and the maintenance of the planes goes on year after year.

Mr. DANAHER. Perhaps the Senator from Missouri can tell me whether or not the authorization for 2,320 planes contained in the act of 1936 has been taken advantage of and the planes built.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is some dispute about that. I think all those planes have been built or provided for. It was the contention of some of the officials who appeared before the committee that there never had been sufficient provision made for the maintenance of the planes authorized in the act to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. DANAHER. Is it not a fact that if section 1 of the act of June 24, 1936, should be repealed, and we should now include in the pending bill not only the recommended 3,000 planes, but also the 2,320 planes, together with the differential referred to on page 4 of the report of the committee, we would be authorizing a program which in effect might involve more of the secrecy about which we have been hearing? What has become of the planes, for General Arnold says there are only 879 fighting planes now in existence in this country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am unable to answer that question. The Senator will have to inquire of the War Department. I myself have not been able to find out.

Mr. DANAHER. There is one other particular in which it seems to me the Committee on Military Affairs ought to explain to us its purpose. On page 14, line 14, and from that to the end of the bill, we read this language:

And there is further authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 during each of the 4 fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year 1941.

What is the reason why this Congress, in 1939, should be conducting a program of authorizations for the 4 years to commence July 1, 1941? I feel that the questions raised by a few considerations directed to the bill itself can enlighten the Senate in a very considerable measure before the vote is taken.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator from Connecticut refer to the section of the bill which deals with educational orders?

Mr. DANAHER. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have an idea that the authorizations there covering a number of years are founded upon an ancient practice which governs the Congress of the United States whenever authorizations are made relating to education; that is, that no rational, coherent, educational program which requires years of pursuit to be accomplished can be planned for with any degree of intelligence at all if it does not at the outset show that there is authorized a sufficient amount of money for a sufficient number of years to carry on the program. If we undertook an educational program which depended for authorization or action by Congress every year, one could not make a plan with any degree of certainty that it would extend beyond the current year. That is my impression of the reason for including authorizations for several years in one bill at the outset, namely, in order to give those who plan the program some certainty that it will be carried over into other years.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator from Vermont a question. As I understand it, section 4, appearing on page 14, is brand new, it is not in any other existing legislation with reference to educational orders in the nature of subsidies looking to the manufacture of planes. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not recall whether or not that is the educational order section.

Mr. DANAHER. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, we have heretofore had an educational program. Congress passed a bill providing for an educational program last year for the first time.

Mr. DANAHER. Is the Senator able to tell us what the experience has been under it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am not able to give a complete report, but I think it was more or less satisfactory. I think the whole program has been so satisfactory that the War Department, the President, and the administration generally have seen fit to enlarge greatly the program which was inaugurated at the last session.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. I can understand how the War Department would like very well to be able to authorize given action over a long-term period; I can understand how common sense future planning must very properly require such a course, but as I understand, the pending bill is offered to provide more effectively for the national defense in the manner outlined by the President in his address on January 12, 1939. We legislate up to June 30, 1941, in every other phase of the bill. It would seem to me reasonable that the War Department itself, based upon its present authorization, and based on the experience thus gained, could come back to Congress and in an adequate and complete way secure such authorizations in the future as the experience of even 1 year would indicate and dictate.

With these few observations with reference to a situation which, it seems to me, is inadequately presented insofar as action on the pending bill is concerned, I thank the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire particularly to address myself to a discussion of the committee amendment No. 1, which represents the increase—as I see it, without rhyme or reason—in the number of planes authorized by the pending measure, from 5,500 to 6,000. I shall attempt presently to show that the increase is not supported by any evidence whatever adduced before either the House Committee on Military Affairs or the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and represents simply a gratuitous attempt on the part of the Army and the supporters of a tremendous armament of taking an additional bite.

Before I enter into a discussion of the committee amendment, however, Mr. President, in view of the range which the debate has taken, I deem it proper to make a few expressions of my own views with regard to the implications of the bill as regards our general military policy and our general foreign policy.

Mr. President, I am in favor of adequate national defense. I take it that every patriotic American, except a few misguided but patriotic individuals, who may conceive that it is possible for any nation to throw away all of its arms and trust simply to the general good will—I take it that every patriotic American, except those few individuals, is in favor of adequate national defense.

Mr. President, we come down then to the question of what is adequate national defense. As has been asked several times in the present debate on the floor of the Senate, For what is the defense to be adequate? Before proceeding to the discussion of this particular amendment, Mr. President, I should like to record my view that the only purpose for which our national defense should be adequate, the only purpose for which we are justified in making authorizations or appropriations, is for the defense of the United States itself.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the United States, under any theory whatever, is justified in using the money of the taxpayers of the United States to provide an army and a navy and an aviation force for the purpose of policing the sea lanes for the protection of the British Empire or the French Empire, or for the protection of the possessions of any foreign country whatever.

Mr. President, I do not believe that it is either necessary or justifiable for the Congress of the United States to be appropriating huge sums of money for the purpose of brandishing our fists in the faces of other nations of the world, or thumbing our noses at any other power in the world. I do not believe that it is justifiable for us to maintain an overwhelming armament for the purpose of trying to protect the investments of a handful of adventurers, possibly 7,000 miles from home. Those who deliberately remain and elect to remain on a scene of combat, all practically a battlefield, the loss of any one of whose lives or property, on the theory that we are bound to protect every American and every dollar abroad, might well bring about the loss of the lives of hundreds of thousands or millions of American boys and the piling up of a debt of billions upon billions of dollars which our grandsons or our great grandsons would not be able to see paid off, are simply trading on grandiose ideas of spurious patriotism like that of Captain Jenkins, who involved England in a war by losing his ear while robbing the Spaniards.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. The very able Senator from Missouri is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and attended very regularly the hearings that were held on this bill. Did the Senator get the impression that this particular bill was intended to implement any such policy as the Senator is very properly denouncing?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I did not. If I had any such idea, I would not vote for the measure with or without the committee amendment. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I stated when I began that I intended in a few moments to discuss the committee amendment No. 1 and the bill itself. I was proceeding to discuss the general situation because of some remarks which have been made on both sides of the question in the debate which has preceded my remarks in the Senate, and more particularly because of certain remarks that have been made by American representatives abroad, by Members of the Senate on the floor and off the floor, and by remarks which were made here in the last 2 or 3 days by Members of the Senate on the floor, and I simply want to make it clear that when I vote for the bill, if I do vote for the bill—as I intend to do, if committee amendment No. 1 is defeated, or even if committee amendment No. 1 is agreed to, and if the Senate agrees to another amendment which I intend to offer of putting a money limitation upon the expenditures—I do not want the impression to go out of the Senate of the United States that I or any other Member of the Senate who casts his or her vote reluctantly for the measure does it with any idea of carrying out the notions enunciated in the statements of Ambassador Bullitt, or Secretary Ickes, or the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], or the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], or any other American citizen who has been announcing to the public of the United States and the world that we are tacitly in alliance with certain countries in the world against certain other countries in the world.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator spoke about adequate defense, and that is what he is for, and that is what I am for. I wonder if he got the impression that I got when sitting on the committee, that a minimum of adequate defense was outlined in the bill by those to whom we have to look for advice, and to what is adequate; that is to say, the staff of the War Department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I am willing to accept, for the purposes of this argument, the statement of the responsible authorities of the War Department as to what is adequate defense, particularly in the matter of aviation, to wit, 5,500 planes for the Army alone, to say nothing of the Navy planes, although I am bound to say, as I think any other Senator who listened to the evidence must admit, that there was no showing made whatever by either the Secretary of War, or the Chief of Staff, or the Chief of the Air Service, except their own bare statements, that so far as the defense of the United States was concerned there was actually any necessity for this further large increase in the air forces of the United States.

Mr. President, it was said that Germany has developed a very large number of airplanes. It was also said that Germany is capable of very much stepping up this mass production. But it was not asserted by any responsible witness, and I do not think by any witness at all, as I recall, that there was any way for the Germans, even if they had 20,000 planes or 30,000 planes, to get over and attack the United States or any part of the United States with planes loaded with bombs, able to be effective, except upon the extremely tenuous and remote hypothesis that it might be possible sometime in the future—it was not asserted that it had ever been done yet—but it might be possible sometime in the future for the Germans or the Italians or somebody else possibly to acquire aviation bases in South or Central America.

Then it is a simple matter to make a compilation of distance. We were assured that if the Germans had a base, let us say, in Venezuela, and had great stocks of their bombs over in Venezuela, and had their planes located in Venezuela, and were prepared to service their planes in Venezuela, that it is only a matter of an hour and a half or 2 hours' flight, depending on the distance, to the Panama Canal. But it was never explained exactly how the Germans were going to acquire aviation bases in Venezuela, or naval bases in the West Indian Islands, and take possession of them, so long as we had a great navy and did not wish them to acquire them.

Answering the question of the Senator from Indiana, Mr. President, I will say that, leaving that out of the consideration, I am willing to accept, for the purpose of the argument, the recommendations of the responsible officials of the War Department as to our aviation interests. I shall presently show that the committee report goes beyond anything that was recommended by the War Department in its responsible testimony, and simply adds an additional gratuity over and above what is said by the Chief of the Air Service of the Army to be adequate to the defense of the United States.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Did not General Arnold, the Chief of the Air Service, testify—and I think the Senator from Missouri himself read the testimony into the record yesterday or day before—that he was for this program, hook, line, and sinker?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. That was the program for 5,500 planes.

Mr. MINTON. He was testifying for the program outlined in the President's message.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He was testifying about the 5,500 planes. That was General Arnold's first appearance before the committee. It was on January 20, when the only suggestion which had been made by anybody was the recommendation of 5,500 planes. On page 42 of the record—and I think it is the official record at last—we find the following:

The CHAIRMAN. General, I find this note here: A report in the newspaper credits General Arnold with the statement he is in favor of constructing 10,000 airplanes. What about that, General?

General ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I am for this program here, hook, line, and sinker—

That is, the 5,500 planes.

because I believe it is a program that is well planned and one that balances the personnel with the airplanes, and one that answers the problem of the aerial defense of the United States, and I cannot see any need at this time for anything more.

Anything more than what? Anything more than the 5,500 planes contained in the recommendation then made to the Senate committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that is an inaccurate report?

General ARNOLD. That is an inaccurate report; yes, sir.

Mr. President, before passing on to the committee amendment I desire to discuss for but a few moments more my views as to the general foreign policy which should determine the matter of provision for national defense.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Before the able Senator departs from this branch of his discussion will he not, as a thoroughly well-informed member of the Military Affairs Committee, inform the Senate how many modern airplanes, in his opinion, Germany and Italy each have at the present time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not think the combined testimony before the Military Affairs Committee shed very much light on that subject. We heard a great deal of conflicting testimony. We heard testimony from the two United States Ambassadors to England and France, neither one of whom, I am frank to say, knew very much of what he was talking about. We heard the testimony of General Arnold, Chief of the Air Service of the Army itself. We heard the testimony of Mr. Mason, of the Civil Aeronautics Authority; and we heard various other estimates by General Craig and other witnesses. I may say that apparently no two witnesses were within 20 percent of each other.

I do not believe that anybody knows at the present time how much of the vaunted preparation of Germany in the matter of airplanes is fact, how much is fable, and how much is bluff. We all know that Colonel Lindbergh was ostensibly permitted to fly over the German aviation bases and German airplane factories. We are told by our Ambassadors that Colonel Lindbergh went over to England and scared Chamberlain into making the Munich agreement. We know that Colonel Lindbergh was decorated by the German Government for his activities. Whether he was decorated for conveying to the British, French, and American Governments the facts which he was supposed to have learned confidentially, or whether he was decorated for assisting the Germans in carrying out a bluff, apparently nobody in this country knows.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. We were not advised that Colonel Lindbergh's figures checked with those of the intelligence departments of England and the United States?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We certainly were; but we were not advised as to what the intelligence departments of England and the United States knew about it outside of what Lindbergh told them.

Mr. MINTON. They knew about what Colonel Lindbergh knew?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. They knew what Lindbergh knew. They know what Lindbergh told them.

Mr. MINTON. That estimate, as I remember it, was something like 9,000 fighting planes in Germany, 6,500 of which could be put right on the line; and about 2,500 in Italy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As I understand, nobody professes actually to have seen the planes, except that Lindbergh professes to have flown over the airdromes and the aviation factories. How many could actually be put on the line is a matter of mere speculation, even in consideration of the very fragmentary information which the committee received.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the able and distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The statement just made was that the figures of our intelligence department checked with those of Colonel Lindbergh. If that is so, I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the American people to the fact that Colonel Lindbergh must have been right in his estimate; and that the great amount of abuse that has been printed in the press about the colonel, our great leader of aviation, is not justified. He gave the truth as he saw it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am unable to say why Lindbergh was decorated by the German Government. The testimony on that point is very conflicting. Mr. Bullitt and Mr. Kennedy seemed to regard the information which was transmitted to Prime Minister Chamberlain by Colonel Lindbergh as of very great service to Great Britain and France. The German Government seemed to consider Colonel Lindbergh's feat in flying over their airdromes in a confidential capacity and conveying that information to the British Government, scaring them nearly to death before the Munich meeting, as a very great service to Germany. He was decorated for it. As to what the actual facts are, I am unable to say, and I have no opinion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of what Lindbergh told Chamberlain, or Chamberlain told Lindbergh, the fact is that day before yesterday General Goering made a speech in which he stated that the German air force now numbered more than 10,000 planes, and that they proposed to build up an air force that would be incredibly large, beyond the imagination of anybody now in Germany or elsewhere.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am certain that my friend the Senator from Kentucky has read the various biographies which have been printed, besides many other stories, of the career of Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest, the great Confederate cavalry leader from Tennessee. No doubt the Senator will recall that one of his greatest devices for bringing about remarkable surrenders and achieving remarkable, bloodless victories on the part of the great Confederate cavalry leader, General Forrest, was that while he was engaging his prospective enemy in parley under a flag of truce he would have his columns ride around in circles and pass a large number of troops within the view of his prospective antagonist. Finally Forrest would jump at his prospective antagonist and say, "I demand your immediate surrender to prevent the infusion of blood." The opposing commander would hesitate. Forrest would then turn to his trumpeter and order, "Sound 'To horse.'" Almost invariably, having seen these tremendous reinforcements marching up and apparently deploying, the commander on the other side, thinking himself hopelessly outnumbered, would surrender. It is possible that General Goering has read the life of General Forrest even as the Senator from Kentucky and myself.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to be able to take the view that the redoubtable and much decorated General Goering is bluffing. However, there are so many other avenues of information of one kind and another which seem to confirm what General Goering said that I am inclined to fear that he is not bluffing. These avenues of information may not all be strictly reliable; and I grant that it is impossible for anybody outside a particular nation to have exact information concerning the number of airships possessed by that nation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Unfortunately, most of the avenues of information to which the Senator from Kentucky refers seem to have come from Goering himself. Mr. President, I do not know what the view of the Senator from Kentucky is; but I have no hesitation in confiding to my friend from Kentucky, not in my official capacity as a United States Senator but privately, that I would not believe Goering under oath.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. As I remember it, the information was to the effect that about a month ago, when we received the information, the total number of planes in Germany was about 9,000, and that at that time they had the ability to produce from 1,000 to 1,200 planes a month. That statement would check up pretty well with Mr. Goering's present story. They have produced just about another thousand planes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, we had every sort of information before the committee. We had information from a very distinguished aviation authority in this country, a member of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, who said that he had been to Germany himself within the year. He said that the Germans had a device known as a helicopter which was going to render every airplane in the world—German, American, British, French, and Japanese—absolutely obsolete as soon as it was perfected, because he said it was a differentiation on the principle of a propeller. The Senator from Tennessee is thinking about an autogiro.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean a helicopter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is a plane which can go up and stop and stand still in the air, or move up or down or to the left or right or forward or backward.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope it will soon be perfected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A distinguished American aviation authority informed us that the Germans already had this machine almost completed, and that it was going to render every other airplane in the world obsolete. Incidentally, he also informed us that the Germans stole it from an American inventor who was foolish enough to send over his invention to Germany and ask for a patent there. Not having received an answer to his first letter, he wrote a second letter; and not having received an answer to his second letter, he wrote a third letter, and so on through a series. Finally he went over to Germany and saw this wonderful device, and he found that the so-called Fokker helicopter was simply his own invention which the Germans had stolen and had developed.

Mr. President, I mention this fact simply to illustrate the statement that we had a wide range of testimony before the Military Affairs Committee, some of which would lead one to believe that the United States could not possibly be safe over night unless it had 35,000 or 40,000 airplanes; and some of which would lead one to believe that any dime that we should spend at this time on the purchase of a large order of new airplanes would be likely to be money wasted and thrown away, because by the time the planes were developed, manufactured, and delivered to us they would have to be put upon the obsolete list, having been made obsolete in the meantime by the development and operation of this helicopter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that it is entirely possible and probable that a good deal of bluffing has been proceeding on the part of certain nations. It may be that the so-called peace of Munich was brought about by the statement, which has been repeated over and over again, that Hitler told Chamberlain he was prepared to send 100 airplanes over London every hour for 24 hours. It may be that the prospect of any such destruction as would be wrought by that sort of an air fleet, which within 6 hours would probably have put out of business whatever defenses by airplane and anti-aircraft guns were located near London and Paris, had an effect. It may be that all that was a bluff; it may be that Hitler did not say that, and, of course, here we do not know what transpired in that conference; but we do know that Germany has emphasized—and so has Italy emphasized—a division of the air in the military preparations which have been going on there.

I was in Germany in 1937, and I saw in Berlin a building larger than the Department of Commerce Building here, containing over 3,500 offices devoted exclusively to the air service. I saw airplane factories in the portions of Germany I visited. I did not go in them, and I could not tell how many airplanes were being produced; but every one understood, for it was common talk among the German people, as was apparent when it was possible to talk with one of them and he thought nobody who would report what he was saying was listening that the Germans were emphasizing and intensifying their desire to become superior in the air.

We do know that Italy, or I think we have reasonable grounds to suppose, that Italy has some 4,500 or 5,000 planes. I do not know whether or not there is anybody in Italy corresponding in unreliability to General Goering in Germany, but I do not think there has been the same amount of bluff—if that is what it is—in Italy that we have witnessed in Germany. However, if it turns out to be true that all the reports have been confirmed by what General Goering said in his speech the other day—and it seems to have been a remarkable speech in the sense that he was giving away what might be regarded as a military secret of the German Reich in regard to the number of airplanes they had and the number they were in prospect of building—if it turns out he was not bluffing but was confirming the reports we have received, would that have any effect upon the attitude the American Congress ought to take in regard to our own defense?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad the Senator mentioned that, because it brings me back to what I started to talk about before I was led aside by the questions and interruptions of some of my colleagues. That brings us back to the question of the foreign policy of the United States and the purpose for which this bill is being passed and the purpose for which we are arming.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky repeats the general stories as to the very great preparation of Germany and, to a lesser extent, of Italy, in the matter of airplane production; but it has not been suggested on this floor by anyone who even assumes to be familiar with the situation—it has certainly not been suggested before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate—that the Germans have or are in process of having even one plane capable of flying across the Atlantic Ocean to the shores of the United States loaded with bombs and then successfully making an attack, let alone being able to fly back to Germany. Napoleon once said that he had figured out seven different ways of landing an army in England, but had never been able to figure out even one way of getting his army out. An airplane flight which could make a one-way nonstop flight without bombs would not be a threat to our national independence.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. In the discussions before the Military Affairs Committee was there any assumption that all this great preparation on the part of Germany and Italy was for the purpose of attacking the United States? If not, are we going to gear our own production here to the assumption that we are to be attacked from the air by Germany and Italy? That is what I want to get clear in my own mind.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can say to the Senator from Washington that there was not a scintilla of evidence before the Military Affairs Committee to that effect. The only testimony before the Military Affairs Committee and the only statement presented before the Senate is that the Germans and Italians may have acquired air supremacy as against France and England. There is no suggestion, except the most fantastic that can be imagined, that there is any present danger or probable danger of the Germans or the Italians, or both combined, coming across the ocean to attack the shores of the United States, except a suggestion, made in the joint meeting of the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate by a Member of the House, which was so fantastic that even Bullitt repudiated it. That suggestion was that the Germans might threaten to attack London and Paris and make the British and French turn over their navies to Germany, and, then, that Germany might come over here and overpower our Navy, and, having overpowered the American Navy, acquire a number of air bases in Central and South America, and come north and attack the United States.

Mr. President, I said when I began that I am in favor of adequate preparation for the defense of the United States, but I am in favor of sensible preparation for the defense of the United States. Let me say that we get far less for our money in naval and military preparations both because of the pay of our workmen and the cost of materials, and the cost of construction of naval vessels and airplanes and every other military and naval stores, than any other country in the world. If we are going to start out to assume that we are going to be "ganged" at one time by Japan, on the one hand, and Germany and Russia and England and France and Italy and Spain and Portugal and Switzerland and every other nation in the world, on the other hand, then there is not sufficient money in the world adequately to prepare us against such a contingency. If we are not going to make such an assumption—

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to have a chance to proceed with my discussion of the question of our foreign policy, and then I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

If we are not going to assume such an attack as mentioned by me a moment ago, then our preparations should be on the basis of what we should reasonably expend for adequate preparation and defense against a reasonably anticipated attack.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says our primary duty is to be prepared for adequate defense. Defense against what?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is precisely what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] asked the other day when he aroused such intense indignation from the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. How does the Senator know who is going to attack us? If a little boy this size [indicating] is going to attack us, we do not need to do much; if a little boy this big [indicating] is going to attack us we need to do a little more; but if the policeman who guards the Vice President is going to attack us we had better do something about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I entirely agree with the Senator from Texas. Let me say to my dear friend from Texas that he by no means originated the term "adequate preparation." I listened to the Senator with great interest for about 4 hours the other day. I heard the intense indignation which he expressed at the question asked by the Senator from Michigan—"adequate defense for what?" That is precisely the subject on which I am now expressing my views. I am expressing the view that there is no probable or reasonable possibility of an attack on us such as I have just outlined.

I am expressing the view that there is no probability or reasonable possibility of an attack on us such as I have just outlined, or such as is contemplated by the advocates in this country of tremendous armament.

Mr. President, it is my belief that if the United States of America, instead of undertaking to act as the policeman for the world, is willing to stay at home and attend to its own business, with reasonable, moderate, modest expenditures for armament on our part there is no nation in the world, and no combination of nations, that can successfully cross the ocean to attack us.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Are we not forced into this sort of an argument by statements of the character of that recently made by Secretary Hull, who announced that American foreign policy rested upon the assumption that we were going to use our armed forces, if necessary, to protect dollars of American investment abroad in foreign lands—that that was our national policy? Of course, if we are going to do that, we may need a navy three times as big as the one we have.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if we are willing to maintain a sufficient naval and military force to enable us to conduct a war 7,000 miles away from home, let us say in China—which, according to all naval authorities, would require us to provide a navy at least three times as big as Japan's, and to maintain an overwhelming military force—if we are going to have any contemplation of doing a thing like that, and provision we have ever made for naval and military forces, or anyone that has ever been suggested in this country, would be pitifully inadequate.

If we propose to fight a war in China to protect Great Britain in its possession of Hong Kong, which Great Britain wrested from the Chinese in the infamous "opium war" by precisely the same methods by which Japan has been taking territory in China during the past 3 or 4 years; if we intend to wage war in Africa to protect France in her possession of Tunisia, which France acquired by precisely the same methods by which Italy acquired Ethiopia; we are going to need both an army and a navy and an air force far greater than anyone in this country has ever dared propose.

If we are going to police the sea lanes to protect the "great democracies of the world," so-called, in the possession which they have asserted and maintained by force, there is no limit to the expenditures of men and blood and money and debt which the United States will be called upon to make.

On the other hand, if we are going to stay at home and attend to our own business, if we are going to be prepared to repel aggression from any source whatever on the United States and our immediate possessions which make up the defense system of the United States, then it seems to me we are being led into a situation of hysteria in which we might very readily appropriate a great deal more money and make a great deal more preparation than would be reasonably necessary.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment.

Mr. President, I abhor as much as does anybody on this floor, or anybody in the United States, the idea of dictatorship, whether it is in Germany or Italy or Russia or anywhere else. I hate the treatment of the Jews in Germany. I hate the treatment of Christians in both Germany and Russia. I hate the methods of murder anywhere. It is very much more agreeable to my conceptions of governmental practice and of proper government for me to observe the so-called democracies of England and France than to observe the dictatorships, whether Communist or Fascist. But it is to be remembered, Mr. President, when we talk about these democracies, and the obligation we owe to these democracies to defend them and protect them, that so far as their international relations are concerned, so far as the conquest of lesser peoples is concerned, the great democracies of Great Britain and France have been as imperialistic and as ruthless in their oppression of minorities and in their subjugation of weaker peoples as any nation that has ever existed in the world.

I can remember, when I was a boy, that I used to go down to the old Columbia Theater on F Street—which was then a new theater, the best in town, in those days—nearly every Sunday afternoon to hear some of the leading American statesmen and publicists inveigh on the subject of "John Bull's crime." That was the subjugation of the Transvaal Republic under old "Oom Paul" Kruger by the ruthless, imperialist British Government.

So I say, Mr. President, that as between the so-called democracies and the so-called dictatorships, my sympathy is entirely with the so-called democracies; I wish them well; but I am not willing to send one American boy away from the United States to die on foreign fields in quarrels between rival imperialisms which do not concern us.

Mr. President, I heard it said on this floor by an eminent Senator whom we all respect, and for whom we all have affection, "I am not afraid to fight a foreign war. I am not afraid to send all the boys in the United States to fight on foreign fields." Mr. President, I am not so brave. Mr. President, I am afraid. I, myself, am not afraid to go again; but I am afraid of the suggestion being made on this floor and in other places that it is justifiable to send American boys halfway around the world to die to protect the paltry investments of the Standard Oil Co., or to die to protect England or France or any other foreign country in any of its suzerainty over subject peoples.

Mr. President, more than 20 years ago, just before the entrance of the United States into the World War, I sat in a room in the Senate wing of the Capitol, the room now occupied by the Committee on Naval Affairs but at that time the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The great Senator from Missouri, one of my greatest predecessors in this body—a man whose seat I am proud to occupy—Senator William J. Stone, was then chairman of the great Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. I sat in his office in conversation with him. He had been my friend since my early boyhood. I saw him get up and walk over to the window and stand looking out, and I heard him say, "Bennett, we are going to have a war. I know it. I am going to vote against it. I am not foolish enough to think that my feeble influence will keep us from getting into the war; and it is going to be the worst thing that ever happened to this country." He said, "It is not the lives it will cost, although, God knows, it is enough to break a man's heart to think of boys like you going away. Some of you won't come back. Some of you who do come back will wish to God you had not come back. Some of you will come back wounded and maimed and blinded and worthless for life; but that is not the worst of it." He said, "It is not the money it will cost, although your great-grandchildren, if you get back and have any, will not see the paying-off of this debt. It is the fact that after the war is over, after we have won the war—and we shall win the war, because we are too big and powerful to get into a war at this stage of the game and not decide it—we shall never again have the same sort of country that we had before."

Mr. President, I have thought about that conversation a thousand times; and I think of that conversation on the part of Senator Stone as that of a man who was smit with prophecy, a prophecy which has been too true. We never have had again the same sort of country we had before. We never again will have the same sort of country we had before.

Mr. President, war itself is the great enemy, the invincible enemy of democracy, and the invincible enemy of liberalism. Fascism on the one hand and communism on the other are the products of war. When I heard an eminent Senator on this floor on yesterday say that he was not afraid to fight a foreign war, that he was not afraid to send all the boys in this country to fight on foreign shores, I shuddered; not alone because I have three boys of my own; not alone because I have a knowledge and a feeling for the millions of American boys who would be sent away; not alone because I once took boys with me in 1917 and promised their fathers and mothers that I would take care of them, some of whom did not come back; but more especially, Mr. President, because of my feeling that if the United States were once again to engage in a foreign war we ourselves might win the war against foreign dictatorships and emerge as having lost the war by being ourselves a totalitarian state.

Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I do not want any vote cast for the pending measure, which I regard, in comparison with some of the grandiose schemes proposed by the Assistant Secretary of War and others, as an essentially modest proposal—I do not want a vote for this bill to be taken in any quarter of this country or in any quarter of the globe as being an endorsement of the statements made by the American Ambassador to France, or the President pro tempore of this body, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], or the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] on yesterday, or anyone else, that the United States is or will be at any stage prepared to enter into an alliance or an understanding or any sort of agreement which will justify any nation whatever on the face of this globe in expecting us to come in and rake their chestnuts out of the fire for them.

Mr. President, I desire to come back to a very brief discussion of the committee amendment. The committee amendment, as I started out by saying, strikes out the limitation contained in the House text of 5,500 planes, without rhyme or reason, as I have heretofore stated, and raises it to 6,000 planes. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the statement of every expert appearing before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate was that 5,500 planes was adequate. I am sorry the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is leaving the Chamber, because he was the one who sought a definition of "adequate," and I was just about to give it to him.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator is getting down to his real speech, I will remain.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be very glad to have the Senator stay or leave, as he pleases. I was about to answer his question as to what was adequate. The Senator asked, What is adequate defense?

According to General Arnold and General Craig and Secretary Woodring, 5,500 planes is adequate defense. My definition is, 5,500 planes. Let me read the testimony to the Senator again:

The CHAIRMAN. General, I find this note here: A report in the newspaper credits General Arnold with the statement he is in favor of constructing 10,000 airplanes. What about that, General?

General ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I am for this program here, hook, line, and sinker, because I believe it is a program that is well planned, and one that balances the personnel with the airplanes, and one that answers the problem of the aerial defense of the United States, and I cannot see any need at this time for anything more.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that is an inaccurate report?

General ARNOLD. That is an inaccurate report; yes, sir.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Did General Arnold say in that statement that he was for 5,500 planes?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The testimony is to be read in connection with the statement of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff who preceded General Arnold on the witness stand, who were testifying about a recommendation for 5,500 planes. General Arnold did go into a detailed explanation of it, with a map showing the bases to which the number of planes would be assigned, and he stated, and General Craig stated, and Secretary Woodring stated repeatedly, that the program of 5,500 was adequate and all that was necessary.

Mr. President, the argument which is being made for this increase in the number of planes is that for $170,000,000 we can get 6,000 planes just as easily as we can get 5,500 planes, which is an indictment of the intelligence and the capacity of every American manufacturer of airplanes, if it were true that there was a limitation of $170,000,000 in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. But, bless your life, there is not any limitation of $170,000,000 in the bill, and I defy anyone to show any limitation of $170,000,000 or of any other figure in dollars. The only limitation in the bill is on the number of planes.

It is a very poor rule which will not work both ways. If we could get 6,000 planes for $170,000,000, why could we not get an adequate number of planes, all that would be necessary, 5,500, to be exact, for considerably less than $170,000,000? But those who drew the bill were careful not to include any limitation whatever in it, and if the bill shall be enacted in the form reported by the Senate committee, there will be nothing in the law to prohibit the Secretary of War buying 6,000 planes for a billion dollars, then sending up a deficiency estimate, expecting Congress to appropriate the difference.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Getting back to the 5,500, not being on the Committee on Military Affairs, of course I am at a disadvantage, and all of us who are not on the committee are at a disadvantage in getting a consensus as to what the responsible Army officers and responsible heads of the Government really think would be adequate preparation along this line.

My impression has been, and I assume that before the Army officers testified before the Committee on Military Affairs, and before the President made his recommendations in his message, all these matters were gone over among the officers and in all the responsible departments, figuring on probable contingencies, and that the 5,500 was arrived at as a sort of minimum which they believed would be adequate.

I know that there were other officers, probably equally as intelligent officers, who thought that 5,500 would not be a sufficient number. There were some who went as high as 10,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Probably some would go as high as 30,000 if they thought there was any chance of putting it over.

Mr. BARKLEY. My impression was that the 5,500 recommended by the President was a reasonable minimum which had been the result of conferences and discussions all along the line, and that it was not regarded as a maximum. Am I correct in my interpretation of what seems to have been the consensus?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I merely repeat what I stated a while ago, which is borne out by all the testimony before the committee, that the Chief of the Air Service testified that he was for this program calling for 5,500 planes, hook, line, and sinker, because he thought that number was entirely adequate, and that we did not need any more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, when men, after discussion over a wide range of possibilities, come to an understanding about what they will recommend, they feel it their duty to stand by the recommendation, frequently, in the same fashion that members of committees who disagree during the consideration of legislation in committee and come onto the floor with a report, feel that they are more or less bound to fight for what the committee has agreed on.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. General Arnold is by no means mealy-mouthed; he is by no means hard to understand. I did not on any occasion see anyone put any words in General Arnold's mouth that he was not willing to have put in his mouth. He was entirely capable of taking care of himself and handled himself as an expert witness. I cannot imagine him not having meant what he said when he stated what I have read, speaking of the program of 5,500 planes.

One that answers the problem of the aerial defense of the United States, and I cannot see any need at this time for anything more.

If that did not mean that General Arnold thought that 5,500 planes was a sufficient number, what did it mean? And if he thought 5,500 was a sufficient number, how would he have expressed it any more emphatically than he did in those words?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I was very much interested in the statement of the Senator from Missouri that there was no limitation on the amount.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no limitation whatever on the amount.

Mr. FRAZIER. Near the top of page 22 of the hearing it is shown that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] asked General Craig this question:

Do you find a substantial increase in cost in the last 2 or 3 years? General CRAIG. Yes, sir. It has been only a short time since a $50,000 plane was a real plane. Now they run up as high as $300,000, $400,000, $500,000, $600,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is absolutely true; and, as I stated a moment ago, there is no limitation of any sort whatever in this bill on the amount. There is a limitation as to the Panama Canal defense, but there is no limitation in the bill on the amount.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am interested to know what is contemplated in regard to the time, whether we have 5,500 or 6,000. How much time is contemplated as necessary to build them—over what period?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There was some conflict on the subject of the time within which the planes could be constructed, and particularly with regard to the effect which the sale of this large number of planes to the French would have on our own production program.

The original program of the Army, as stated by General Arnold and General Craig, contemplated the production of 5,500 planes within 2 years. As to what effect the sale of these planes to the French, and other complicating factors which may enter in, may have, there was no unanimity of opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not figuring that they should be built immediately or in the immediate future. My own idea is that unless some emergency should arise to change the attitude of our Government, it would be better if the time within which these planes are to be constructed were spread out over a considerable period, and I think such action would improve the quality of the planes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree very fully with the Senator from Nebraska as to that point. Of course, everyone who is familiar with the facts knows that the rate of obsolescence of airplanes, due to the progress of the science, is very great indeed. For instance, a couple of years ago we put in an order for a certain class of bombers—I think 200 was the order; the planes were manufactured and delivered later in accordance with the specifications, as per contract. The last of the planes has just been delivered in the last few months. As the new planes were delivered from the factory, being in accordance with specifications, they were accepted, paid for by the Government, and placed on the list of obsolescent planes, because new developments had made them obsolescent before they were even delivered to us.

Mr. President, I do not think I violate any confidence in saying what I am now about to say, because it has appeared in the newspapers—although the suggestion was first made to us in committee in confidence—but the newspapers, by reason of the crash, or partial crash, of a plane in New York, have been familiar with the fact—I am certain that I violate no confidence when I say that a plane which was developed while other planes were being prepared for entry in the Army competitions, a plane which the Army itself developed, recently broke the record in a transcontinental flight and by reason of its greater speed it has probably made all the planes which are being prepared for the Army competition obsolete before they are even tried out by the War Department. That is the situation with regard to the development of the aviation science; that if we were to buy 10,000 planes or 12,000 planes or 20,000 planes, as has been suggested in some quarters and from more extravagant sources, we have no assurance whatever that every one of them will not be obsolete before they can even be delivered and accepted and paid for by the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact also that if you have the model and the manufacturing facilities you can manufacture an exceedingly large number of airplanes in a very short period of time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. WALSH. And has it not heretofore been assumed to be the policy of the Army and the Navy that there ought not to be on hand at any one time a large number of airplanes because of the obsolescence which the Senator has referred to and because of the fact that if we should become involved in war we could rapidly build up a large Air Corps?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That has been the theory of the Army and the Navy up to date.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I do not understand that the War Department or the experts contend, as the Senator from Massachusetts just said, that if we were to become involved in a war we can easily expand our Air Corps and procure airplanes rapidly. That is just the thing we cannot do, and we found that out in the World War. We were in the war for 17 or 18 months and never got a plane over to the front. That is the thing which the War Department is trying to guard against.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree with the Senator that that is a historical fact, and the reason was that we had never had a military model before the war, and instead of taking models which had been approved by our Allies, we undertook to develop a new engine, the Liberty motor, which contained a lot of new bugs, which were not sufficiently worked out, and in spite of all our attempts to manufacture military airplanes and get them over to the western front, we were able to send over only a few planes which were flown a day or two before the armistice.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. With respect to the program we are talking about, General Arnold testified on page 78 of the hearings:

It will take 2 years from the time they get the order.

To complete the program.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I stated a moment ago.

Mr. MINTON. It does not seem that even in peacetime we could get along with a modest order of that kind and get production, if it takes 2 years to get such a program through.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In ordinary practice it takes 6 to 8 months from the time the first plane is delivered until the second plane, under the order, is delivered. Then it takes several months more, having worked out the bugs in the second plane, before they go into production. But after they get into production, which was what I understood the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to refer to, they can step up the production to an almost indefinite extent.

Mr. MINTON. They never get into production until you give orders, and you would be waiting until a war comes on to give them an order, and they would get into production a couple of years later.

One other citation from the record might answer the question asked by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a moment ago. General Arnold says on page 85 of the Senate committee hearings:

The orders that France and England have pending in this country now were made with the understanding that they would not slow up our production. So if we go into this increased production, we would just quite naturally slow up their deliveries.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. There is one thing to which I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri. If we had 5,500 planes now, obsolescence would not be as important as one might think, because, as I understand, there will have to be a replacement of 1,100 planes every year, or about 20 percent; is that not true?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that is true.

Mr. LOGAN. So if new planes were invented we would each year get one-fifth of them as fast as they were invented in order to maintain our active planes up to 5,500.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the point I have been making throughout my remarks was that the Chief of the Air Service in the War Department, and every expert witness who testified, testified that 5,500 was an adequate number of planes. The argument is made, as I said a while ago, that you can get 6,000 for $170,000,000 as easy as you can get 5,500; and I think that seems to be an indictment of the intelligence of the American manufacturer. But, Mr. President, that is not true. No one will contend that it is true, although the inference is left that, if we were to get 6,000 planes instead of 5,500 planes, it would be at the same price; that they would not cost the Treasury of the United States anything additional.

Mr. President, the initial cost of the plane amounts to only about one-half of the original cost connected with it. I mean that what you pay the manufacturer for the plane is only about one-half of even the original cost, because the establishment of airdromes, the setting up of a technical organization on the ground, of ground forces, and all of the extra cost that goes into the operation of the plane itself amounts to as much or more than the original cost of the plane, simply as an initial outlay, and, of course, in addition to that you have to go on with these extra expenses year after year, year after year, as long as the plane is in operation.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator know whether or not this particular record of the hearings contained all the testimony given before the committee?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can say that none of them contained all of it.

Mr. DANAHER. Whether or not what happened at the White House is known generally, there is one man who knows what all the facts are, and he has recommended that we build and authorize 3,000 planes. Is that not so?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator please tell me then from what source the demand for 5,500 planes emanates?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The total will be 5,500 planes.

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the total, with what we have now.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the number of planes the bill authorizes is 3,200, which, with what has already been authorized, makes 5,500?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. The suggestion of going above that, as I recall, came from the War Department. I do not know which one of the chiefs suggested that perhaps by procuring a large number of planes they could, with the amount of money appropriated, secure—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, no one knows how much is authorized. No certain amount is authorized in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I thought there was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should be glad to have the Senator show what it is.

Mr. LOGAN. I may be wrong about that. I thought the amount was $300,000,000, divided up—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the Senator and I will agree that the figure $170,000,000 comes about in this way: The President in his message mentioned the sum of $300,000,000. Three hundred million dollars was afterward broken down in a letter from the War Department which the chairman of the committee showed me the other day; $170,000,000 for new planes and $130,000,000 for airdromes and ground improvements, and one thing or another of that sort. But if we enact the bill in its present form, there is no limitation on earth to the amount of money that the War Department can spend, except a letter from the War Department saying they intend to spend $170,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. If a large sum is to be expended for planes—and not more than 3,200 planes could be obtained with that sum of money—we would have to raise that limit; but if they do not spend all the money, we simply have that much money left unexpended?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if we need only 5,500, it seems to me to be an entirely feasible matter to get the 5,500 at a sum less than $170,000,000, and save that much for the hard-pressed taxpayers of the Nation.

Mr. LOGAN. So the question is not very material after all?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the question of whether to spend more or less money is very material.

Mr. LOGAN. The same amount of money is authorized in either event.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say that if the committee amendment is adopted, I then intend, when I have an opportunity, to offer a further amendment to fix the amount authorized at $170,000,000, so we do not have to depend on the Secretary of War; so that we will have a congressional enactment on the subject. I think we ought to have both of them—an authorization of 5,500 planes and a limitation of not more than $170,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. There ought to be a limit in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no limit in it whatever, I think the Senator will agree with me, except the limitation on the new defenses and the provision for the defenses of the Panama Canal.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking of a limit on the appropriation. Ordinarily I think that is very good legislative practice. Has the Senator given consideration to the thought that we are now dealing with the production of airplanes, the cost of which, as I understand, is constantly increasing? It seems to me I can see a danger in limiting the money rather than the number of planes. The amount of money might be insufficient if some new development took place which would enable us to obtain a much better plane at a very much enhanced price.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think there ought to be a limitation on both the number and the amount of money. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it seems to me that we are in the inevitable pre-war inflation period. When the Government starts to buy munitions on a tremendous scale, whether they be battleships, shells, powder, airplanes, or anything else, the manufacturers begin to hoist their prices, the cost of labor goes up, material men begin to raise their prices, and we soon have an inflation of values which leads to the inevitable concomitant of a depression after the war. It seems to me, Mr. President, in view of the experience of the Maritime Commission in the purchase of ships last year, the experience that is being had by the Navy Department in the letting of bids for naval vessels, and the bids which have come to us for airplanes, that we have already entered upon the tragic period of pre-war inflation; and that every safeguard the Congress can possibly put upon its appropriations in that pre-war period of inflation ought to be adopted in the interest of the American taxpayer.

Mr. NORRIS. By the questions I am asking I am seeking only to help.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am very certain of that, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator speaks of a combination to increase prices. As a result of our past experience, his remarks appeal to me very much. Has the Senator given any thought to the idea of regulating the price and avoiding a combination which might unduly increase the price by including, either in this bill or some other bill, an appropriation which would provide for a Government manufacturing plant by which the Government itself could engage in the airplane business if it wanted to do so? I do not mean with the idea of supplying all the airplanes we need.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am very much in favor of such a proposal. Together with the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] and two or three other Senators, I am one of the authors of a bill which has been introduced for that very purpose, having to do with naval vessels and every other type of munition. However, I should add that the War Department is very much opposed to the idea and has brought to bear every possible pressure. Whenever the matter has been suggested, the War Department has been very much opposed to the Government manufacture of airplanes. It is the position of the War Department that the Government cannot manufacture airplanes as well as private manufacturers. Why that is I do not know. As I say, my own personal feeling is that the Government ought to establish factories for the manufacture of every sort of munitions, at least to the extent that such action will provide an adequate yardstick on the fairness of bids which may be made to the Government by private manufacturers.

Mr. NORRIS. The question of the Government manufacture of ammunition and firearms and the building of naval vessels has always been very hotly contested ever since I have been in public life.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the same argument would apply to the question of the Government going into the building of airplanes. For reasons which it is not now necessary to go into, I have always felt that the Government was perfectly justified in the establishment of navy yards where it could build ships itself. I think the reduced prices that have come to the Government on account of the existence of the ability of the Government to manufacture its own naval vessels has much more than repaid what we should have lost in higher prices if we had not been able to build the ships ourselves. I think the same reasoning would apply to airplanes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that a complete illustration of the fact which he has just recited is afforded by a comparison of the tremendous increases in prices made by private shipbuilding companies to the Maritime Commission, which had no Government facilities for building its own vessels, as compared to the bids made to the Navy Department, which did have, to a certain extent, facilities for building naval vessels. The advance in bids in the case of the proffers made to the Maritime Commission was very much greater than the increase in the prices quoted to the Navy Department, because the Maritime Commission had no method of protecting itself against exorbitant bids, and the Navy Department had.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I intended. I urge upon the Senate the consideration of the entire waste of money, as I see it, in the committee amendment.

I now return to the proposition with which I started, that the only justification for the bill, the only ground upon which anyone can conscientiously vote for it, is that it is for the necessary defense of the United States. To appropriate more than is asked for, more than is testified by the most competent authorities and experts of the War Department as being adequate and necessary, is to my mind a pure waste of money.

Mr. President, to return for just a moment to the foreign policy of the United States—

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. From my study in the Committee on Naval Affairs of the problem of national defense through the air, I have been impressed with the thought that the first and most important factor in national defense from the standpoint of aviation is the training of reserve pilots and officers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think there can be any question about that.

Mr. WALSH. Two years are required to train a pilot, but only a few months to build an airplane. I am not familiar with the program in the Army, except as I have heard it discussed. I have not been able to follow the hearings. I should like to know what provision, if any, is made substantially and immediately to increase the number of pilots for aviation service?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As I recall, the only provision is for training certain college students. I may say to the Senator that I have received a protest from one of the leading aviators in the United States, who also has been one of the leading manufacturers of airplanes in the United States, a man who was formerly the squadron commander of Colonel Lindbergh during Colonel Lindbergh's service in the Missouri National Guard. He protests very bitterly against the provision in the bill limiting training to college students, because he says there are a great many mechanics and young men all over the country who did not have an opportunity to be college students, and do not now have an opportunity to be college students. They have been trained as mechanics, and more or less trained in aviation, and are equipped in every way to become excellent pilots. Under the terms of the bill they will be excluded from training. He points out that Colonel Lindbergh, for example, had no opportunity of going to college; that he, himself, had no opportunity of going to college; that many of our best war fliers had no opportunity of going to college; and that they would be excluded from training by the terms of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Does the bill exclude enlisted men from becoming pilots?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The bill provides for the training of college students, and college students alone.

Mr. WALSH. Some of the best pilots in the Navy are enlisted men.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true in the Army as well.

Mr. WALSH. Are we now to limit to college men the vocation or art of piloting in the aviation field?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would not say that there is a limitation. However, there is a provision in the bill for the training of college students, and college students alone.

Mr. WALSH. Are these planes to be built immediately? Over what period of time is it contemplated to build them?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand it is contemplated that they will be built within 2 years. I will ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to answer that question.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The program contemplates construction over a 2-year period; and deliveries are expected to begin within 6 months after funds are made available.

Mr. WALSH. Have we a sufficient number of trained pilots to operate the planes expected to be delivered within the next 6 months?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The pilots are now in training, or will be, in sufficient numbers to meet the first increments. Additional training facilities will take care of additional increments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, very briefly to conclude, let me repeat that so far as the question of our obligation to put ourselves and our resources at the disposal of the so-called democracies of the world is concerned, I think the greatest contribution that the United States of America can render to democracy in the world is to take care of democracy in the United States of America, to preserve our institutions intact, and to give an example to the world of democracy in this country.

I again refer to the great speech made by President Roosevelt at Chautauqua on August 14, 1936, to which reference was made yesterday by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and today by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. I wish again to read a few extracts from that speech. The President said:

Long before I returned to Washington as President of the United States I had made up my mind that pending what might be called a more opportune moment on other continents, the United States could best serve the cause of a peaceful humanity by setting an example. That was why on the 4th of March 1933 I made the following declaration:

"In the field of world policy I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbor—the neighbor who resolutely respects himself and because he does so, respects the rights of others—the neighbor who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors."

This declaration represents my purpose; but it represents more than a purpose, for it stands for a practice. To a measurable degree it has succeeded; the whole world now knows that the United States cherishes no predatory ambitions. We are strong; but less powerful nations know that they need not fear our strength. We seek no conquest; we stand for peace.

In the whole of the Western Hemisphere our good neighbor policy has produced results that are especially heartening.

The noblest monument to peace and to neighborly economic and social friendship in all the world is not a monument in bronze or stone but the boundary which unites the United States and Canada—3,000 miles of friendship with no barbed wire, no gun or soldier, and no passport on the whole frontier.

Mutual trust made that frontier—to extend the same sort of mutual trust throughout the Americas was our aim.

A little later the President said:

Throughout the Americas the spirit of the good neighbor is a practical and living fact. The 21 American Republics are not only living together in friendship and in peace, they are united in the determination so to remain.

To give substance to this determination a conference will meet on December 1, 1936, at the capital of our great southern neighbor, Argentina, and it is, I know, the hope of all chiefs of state of the Americas that this will result in measures which will banish wars forever from this vast portion of the earth.

Peace, like charity, begins at home; that is why we have begun at home. But peace in the western world is not all that we seek.

It is our hope that knowledge of the practical application of the good-neighbor policy in this hemisphere will be borne home to our neighbors across the seas.

We shun political commitments—

Said the President—

We shun political commitments which might entangle us in foreign wars; we avoid connection with the political activities of the League of Nations; but I am glad to say that we have cooperated wholeheartedly in the social and humanitarian work at Geneva. Thus we are a part of the world effort to control traffic in narcotics, to improve international health, to help child welfare, to eliminate double taxation, and to better working conditions and laboring hours throughout the world.

LXXXIV—140

We are not isolationists except insofar as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from war. Yet we must remember that so long as war exists on earth there will be some danger that even the nation which most ardently desires peace may be drawn into war.

I have seen war. I have seen war on land and sea. I have seen blood running from the wounded. I have seen men coughing out their gassed lungs. I have seen the dead in the mud. I have seen cities destroyed. I have seen 200 limping, exhausted men come out of line—the survivors of a regiment of 1,000 that went forward 48 hours before. I have seen children starving. I have seen the agony of mothers and wives. I hate war.

I have passed unnumbered hours, I shall pass unnumbered hours thinking and planning how war may be kept from this Nation.

The Congress of the United States has given me certain authority to provide safeguards of American neutrality in case of war.

The President of the United States, who, under our Constitution, is vested with primary authority to conduct our international relations, thus has been given new weapons with which to maintain our neutrality.

Nevertheless—and I speak from a long experience—the effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State.

It is clear that our present policy and the measures passed by the Congress would in the event of a war on some other continent, reduce war profits which would otherwise accrue to American citizens. Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster. It was the prospect of war profits that made our farmers in the West plow up prairie land that should never have been plowed, but should have been left for grazing cattle. Today we are reaping the harvest of those war profits in the dust storms which have devastated those war-plowed areas.

It was the prospect of war profits that caused the extension of monopoly and unjustified expansion of industry and a price level so high that the normal relationship between debtor and creditor was destroyed.

Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fools' gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

I may say, Mr. President, that that condition which the President predicted 2 years ago is coming to pass in the United States today before a state of war is even in existence.

They would tell you—

Continued the President—

They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations, the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

That is what we are hearing today over the radio and in the newspapers of the country. The President continues:

It would be hard to resist that clamor—

And it is now becoming hard to resist it—

It would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond—to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning that comes from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

If we face the choice of profits or peace, the Nation will answer—must answer—"we choose peace." It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of public opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous.

With that wise and experienced man who is our Secretary of State, whose statesmanship has met with such wide approval, I have thought and worked long and hard on the problem of keeping the United States at peace. But all the wisdom of America is not to be found in the White House or in the Department of State; we need the meditation, the prayer, and the positive support of the people of America who go along with us in seeking peace.

No matter how well we are supported by neutrality legislation, we must remember that no laws can be provided to cover every contingency, for it is impossible to imagine how every future event may shape itself. In spite of every possible forethought, international relations involve of necessity a vast uncharted area. In that area safe sailing will depend on the knowledge and the experience and the wisdom of those who direct our foreign policy. Peace will depend on their day-to-day decisions.

At this late date, with the wisdom which is so easy after the event and so difficult before the event, we find it possible to trace the tragic series of small decisions which led Europe into the Great War in 1914 and eventually engulfed us and many other nations.

Mr. President, with every word of that great address of the President, made at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 14, 1936, when he was a candidate, I am in entire accord, and the overwhelming majority of the American people are in entire accord. I pray, Mr. President, that the meditation and the study of these great problems for which the President then called on the American people may now be provided to us, because, as I predicted a year ago in the consideration of the extraordinary naval authorization bill, there can be no doubt whatever that we are in the midst of a definite effort of propaganda in this country to make this country war conscious; to assume that there is to be a war abroad, and to take it for granted that if there is to be a war abroad we shall make no substantial effort to preserve our neutrality and keep out, but must necessarily so shape our course in advance that we shall be prepared to enter into the war on the side of one set of belligerents.

Against that course on the part of any public man I protest. I pray to Almighty God that the American people may be sufficiently aroused to determine American public policy against any such course.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator from Missouri leaves the floor I desire to express to him on my own account my deep gratitude for the address he has just made to the Congress and the country. I think it is one of the most courageous and most persuasive and most invincible and most unanswerable speeches I have heard in my day in the United States Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator very much.

JOINT MEETING OF TWO HOUSES—ORDER FOR RECESS AND ADJOURNMENT

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. CLARK of Missouri,

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for the purpose of my making a unanimous-consent request, as I am compelled to leave the Chamber?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the business of the Senate today it stand in recess until 11:30 o'clock a. m. tomorrow, and that, at the conclusion of the joint session of the two Houses tomorrow, the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection; but I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky is it his purpose to have a vote on the pending amendment today?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is perfectly obvious we cannot vote on anything today.

Mr. McNARY. I assumed that to be so, but I wanted to be sure, because the inquiry has been propounded to me many times.

Mr. BARKLEY. The reason I make the request at this time is that I have got to leave the Chamber. I submit the request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

After the conclusion of the speech of Mr. CLARK of Missouri,

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3791) to provide more effectively for the national defense by carrying out the recommendations of the President in his message of January 12, 1939, to the Congress.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] stated that the Senate Military Affairs Committee adopted this increased maximum, namely, 6,000 planes, without rhyme or reason; in other words, that we picked it from the thin air. The fact is that we got it from the War Department itself. We followed the original suggestion of the War Department in its official effort to carry out the plan proposed by the President. In the bill on this subject originally sent both to the House and to the Senate by the War Department, a maximum authorization of 6,000 planes was requested. Let me read the first section of the bill now before the Senate, which was first sent us by the War Department as a separate bill:

*Be it enacted, etc., That * * * the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to equip and maintain the Air Corps with not to exceed 6,000 serviceable planes—*

And so forth. It was the House Committee on Military Affairs that reduced the maximum from 6,000 to 5,500 and the House sustained that reduction. The War Department did not ask for 6,000 planes as a permanent operating number of planes. It asked for this as a maximum authorization, needed to maintain a practicable average which would carry out the War Department plan, that average being about 5,500.

This bill from the War Department undoubtedly represented the view of all the experts in the Department; and when the experts discussed the bill before the Senate committee they discussed it with the idea in mind of an average of 5,500 under a maximum authorization of 6,000.

I trust that the restoration by the Senate committee of the figure first sent down by the War Department as a maximum authorization will be accepted by the Senate.

The increase we have provided in this authorization will not involve the expenditure of a single dollar beyond the amount the President originally had in mind when he proposed the program. He suggested $300,000,000 for the Air Service, and of that $300,000,000 he has planned to use $170,000,000 for airplanes, the rest to be used for organizational equipment, bombs, personnel, and so forth. We have his word that this will be the limit requested by the Department for airplanes in connection with this plan.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. In view of the presence of the element of obsolescence in military and naval planes, which is apparently so great, and which of necessity would probably involve a much larger expenditure than in ordinary commercial operations, can the Senator give us some idea of what the over-all cost of a plane might be? I presume, of course, it would depend upon the character of the plane, whether a pursuit plane or a bomber; but what can we look forward to in the way of expense for the maintenance and replacement of planes of that type?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The estimate in connection with the present plan, if this bill should be passed, is that operation and maintenance after 1941 will amount to about $233,000,000 a year. It is difficult to give the cost for a single plane.

Mr. BONE. We have no way of securing a really effective check on prices since the Government and Congress have refused to do anything, I know at my urgent request many times, with the airplane factory in Philadelphia. I wanted the Government to have some sort of a yardstick set up by which it could measure prices, for we have been through one or two very bad scandals in the matter of furnishing munitions of war, and apparently we are going to strip ourselves of any sort of a yardstick in this operation.

Frankly, I do not like that. I am not asserting that airplane companies will do anything vicious or bad in this respect; but we have had a very unhappy experience in the past, and I shall watch with interest what we do with the Government airplane factory in Philadelphia. Repeated efforts have been made to destroy that factory, and I am wondering what sort of check we are going to have on prices for airplanes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am in favor of any reasonable restriction that may be thrown about that matter. I am as much in earnest on that subject as is the Senator.

Mr. BONE. We ought not to let down all our guards, and permit private airplane manufacturers to make a Roman holiday of a program of this sort.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We are not letting them down. The Air Corps has one of the strictest and most effective systems of checking what these factories make in the way of profits and whether they are "putting anything over" on the Government—as strict a system, in my judgment, as has any other organization in America.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. That point was pretty well discussed in the hearings. I shall not read what was said, but I call the Senator's attention to pages 54 and 55, where General Arnold definitely stated that the War Department knew to the fraction of a percent the profits made in each airplane factory to which they let contracts. He also suggested that it might be possible that legislation later would be helpful in limiting or putting a ceiling on those profits, and I am sure we should find no disagreement in this body to doing that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated, if I correctly understood him, that after a certain length of time the cost of maintenance would be more than $230,000,000 a year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The cost of operation and maintenance after this plan shall have gone into effect, 2 years from now, is estimated to be about $233,000,000 a year.

Mr. KING. I presume that does not include the payments made to the technicians, and to the pilots, and to the enlisted men and officers who are connected with the operation of the planes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes; it includes all costs of operation.

Mr. BONE. Does it include replacements?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; maintenance and operation include replacements.

Mr. BONE. I understand that; but, of course, there is the element of obsolescence in military and naval planes, which, perhaps, is of a stature not found in many forms of business. These planes are being continually improved by forms of streamlining, and in engine construction, and in various other ways, with primary stress, I suspect, on speed, which is becoming more and more the vital element.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true; but as the planes become obsolescent, say, for fighting purposes, there are other ways in which they can be used, namely, for training and transport. The average life of a plane in the Air Corps is about 5 years.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator one other question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What is the basis of calculation that the cost for maintenance and operation will amount to $200,000,000 plus?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I asked the Air Corps Service for the total figure, and I did not go any further at the time. I shall endeavor to get for the Senator the information he desires.

Mr. KING. I was wondering how many planes they assume will be in operation in order to bring about the cost of $200,000,000 plus.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They figure an average of 5,500 planes, which may mean sometimes more and sometimes fewer than that number.

Mr. KING. It does not contemplate, then, in excess of 5,500 planes?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Except what excess may be necessary to keep the 5,500 as an average; that is all.

To show that the President had in mind the probability of having more than 5,500 planes in order to maintain the average, let me quote from his message of January 12. He said:

It is proposed that $300,000,000 be appropriated for the purchase of several types of airplanes for the Army. This should provide a minimum increase of 3,000 planes, but it is hoped that orders placed on such a large scale will materially reduce the unit cost and actually provide many more planes.

This shows that the President had in mind the probability of more planes than the minimum of 3,000.

It so happens that the minimum of 3,000 added to the planes which we shall have under the present plan—and it will take 2 years to complete the present plan—makes 5,500. That is how the figure 5,500 came in; and the House adopted that figure as the maximum, which would, of course, prevent us from getting an average of 5,500.

As to the actual sum itself not being specifically authorized in the bill, let me say that I consulted the office of the Comptroller General and was told by him that the authorization of an additional activity for an existing agency was a sufficient authorization for the acquisition of that activity and an appropriation therefor; that the department concerned would come before the Committees on Appropriations and the Committees on Appropriations would then decide what was reasonably adequate in order to secure that activity. That is why we did not put the specific amount in the bill.

Mr. President, I call attention further to the fact that after the entire amount authorized in the bill shall have been secured, not only the additional planes but the planes now authorized, we will have a front-line fighting force of less than 2,500 planes, indicating to my mind a modest and conservative plan in view of the scope of our national defense.

Mr. President, I believe that is all I have to say at present.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I am unwilling to allow any Member of this body to make a stronger statement for peace than I. I am also unwilling for any Member to infer that those of us who vote for the pending committee amendment do not favor peace as ardently as those who vote against it.

I favor keeping America out of war, and I favor keeping war out of America, and the only defense against an air raid is to have enough planes of our own to repel the attack.

Mr. President, we have for a long time been short, so far as air defense is concerned. I believe this is because of our dual national defense program, that is, of the Navy and the Army, with air defense as an orphan bounced back and forth between the two. I do not say it with any disrespect to our fine Army aviation, but the fact is that our Army fliers were unable successfully to carry the mail. It is true it was not a fair test, but I submit that if they could not carry the mail they could not repel an attack of airplanes.

I will put my record in championing world peace alongside that of any man, and I heartily concur in the fine words spoken by my able colleague, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. We have served together shoulder to shoulder in the American Legion organization, we have joined hands in its programs, we see eye to eye in preventing war profits. Both of us ardently yearn for peace in the United States.

I call the attention of Senators to Ethiopia. Did Ethiopia meddle in the affairs of other countries? Did Ethiopia put her nose into other people's business? Was it a top-heavy air defense on the part of Ethiopia which caused Mussolini's war eagles to blast that nation off the face of the earth as a nation?

The Senator from Missouri in his able and eloquent manner presented a terrible picture of those buddies of ours who served in France as they returned. I could not but in my imagination see the pictures I have seen of the poor Ethiopian people, depending upon their bush warfare to defend their nation. I could not help remembering pictures I had seen of those men as their own hillsides were strewn with the dead who had died trying to fight with out-of-date weapons of defense. I could not but remember movie newsreels I had seen of the war in China, of hordes of slain Chinese, a little girl leaning over and shaking the body of her father, whose life had been blown out by a bomb dropped from the air. Do not Senators think that China would have been glad to have enough airplanes to send up to repel the air attacks and the air raids?

I will not allow any man in this body or anywhere else on the face of the earth to champion peace more than I. But there are two ways of looking at it. I favor keeping America out of war, and I favor keeping war out of America, and the only way we can do that is to have sufficient strength to repel an attack.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. For two days we have been hearing a lot of fervent oratory which would lead one to believe that the matter before the Senate at the present time was a resolution declaring war on some nation, and that the reason why we were going to declare war was that we wanted to police the lanes of the earth for some other nation, that we wanted to pull some nation's chestnuts out of the fire. Is there any such problem as that embraced in the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. LEE. There is not, and the Senator is quite correct; but the inference has been, in the speeches, that those of us who support this very modest effort to bring our air defense up to a reasonable figure are arguing in favor of war, or in favor of meddling in some other nation's business. Every expert before our committee testified that the program outlined in the pending bill was not of sufficient size to lead us to attack any country; was not of sufficient size to enable us to wage even a defensive major war; that it was simply the barest possible air defense which, in their judgment, would enable the United States to maintain a posture of respectable national defense, which would cause other nations to respect us. It is a program which is spread over 2 years; therefore, divide it in half, and it will be seen that it provides a very small air defense compared with that of Germany.

I wish the Senator from Missouri had remained in the Chamber, because I desire to call attention to the fact that I did not hear one witness who had any access to the facts at all who put the number of fighting planes in Germany below 9,000. That was the lowest and it ranged from that upward. One newspaperman put the number at 18,000, but he did not appear before the committee, although he had access to the facts, had been to Germany in person. Others who testified before the committee put the number of fighting planes in Germany alone far in excess of 9,000, and stated that the number in Italy was five or six thousand. I am not sure as to the last figure, but I am as to the figure for Germany.

Mr. MINTON. And the ability of Germany at the present time to produce 1,200 planes a month.

Mr. LEE. That is correct; and the most modest estimate of that was a thousand planes a month. The question was asked, "General Arnold, how long will it take to make some of these planes?" The answer was a shrug of the shoulders—"I do not know; perhaps in 6 months we might get two or three." Yet the effort is made here to make it appear that those of us who would have our country prepare sufficiently to be able to repel an attack are war lords, desiring to meddle in some other nation's business, desiring to rake some other nation's chestnuts out of the fire. This bill is for defense and defense only.

Antiaircraft guns are pitiful protection against an air raid. It is very difficult to hit a plane 5,000 or 10,000 feet in the air with one of those guns. The percentage of hits is so low that they do not provide a defense. When you hear the roar of an attacking air fleet coming, and see the horror and fear upon the faces of children and women, and see people running toward bomb-proof dugouts and grabbing gas masks, the only thing that gives you a feeling of security is the sound of a louder roar behind you, and the knowledge that from your own flying field there are certain of your own planes taking off into the air to meet the enemy and fight it out in the air. That is the experience of those abroad.

Germany is vaunting her air defense. Are we to believe those who know? Are we to believe the Ambassador to France? Are we to believe the Ambassador to England, who comes here and calls us together, not with the idea of keeping anything from the people but with the idea of keeping something for the people, calls us together in a joint meeting, all parties represented, and tells us the situation? We say, "Mr. Ambassador, that seems incredible." The reply is, "Nevertheless, that is the best knowledge we have of the situation."

We are given to believe that if we support the pending bill as the committee reported it we are asking for war, that we would go abroad. I heard the President of the United States say that the last thing he would ever want to see done would be sending any American boys from our shores again. That is my feeling. I will not sit silently by and let anyone put words into my mouth, and I will say that in my opinion the Senator from Missouri read into the mouth of General Arnold words in effect stating that the number of planes asked by the House, 5,500, was entirely adequate. The Senator from Missouri said, "Where do you get that? You made it out of thin air."

The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], has told the Senate that was the first and the original recommendation by the War Department itself, a maximum of 6,000 planes. That is written in the bill as it came from the House, and the Senate committee cut it down to 5,500.

The Committee on Military Affairs is made up of men assigned to that committee by request, in most cases, because they are opposed to war, and want to do everything they can to prevent war. After we heard the testimony, we almost unanimously recommended raising the House figure to 6,000.

That is how it happened. It was not constructed from a fictitious number. It was not an arbitrary figure. I asked the witness when I was there—

Do you think that is enough with which to fight a major war?

Certainly not.

How long will it take to get a program such as that operating?

Well, about 2 years.

Have we enough pilots to fly them?

No; but the bill provides training pilots in 14 colleges of the United States.

Why can we not train more pilots now?

Because the total number of officers we have in the air force today is 2,300.

Do you mean that is all you have in the United States in the entire air force?

That is correct.

Could you not place noncommissioned officers, General Arnold, in the different schools over the Nation, and let them train these students in the ground work?

No; we cannot spare them. We think it better for them to go out through the technological schools.

And that, Mr. President, is written in the bill.

We have seen in the last few months the almost unbelievable happen. We have heard on the floor of the Senate at least two Senators—I cannot challenge their motives; I never would think of questioning their purpose—but we have seen them make light, so to speak, of the number of airplanes that Germany has, of the number of airplanes that Italy has. We have seen them attempt to make the people believe that everyone who reported on that was mistaken; that it was a fairy story; that there is nothing to that. I wonder if they think it is a fairy story that a nation, without any provocation at all, would perpetrate upon a helpless nation what Mussolini perpetrated upon Ethiopia, the outrages perpetrated upon that nation, for which no other defense in the world was made except that Italy wanted that nation.

They would undertake to make you believe the only way that war comes to a nation is when that nation goes out of its way and does something to invite that war. I will tell the Senate what invites war in this day of dictator nations. It is weakness.

One could hardly believe in this day, if one did not know it, that a nation has expanded its territory with cold-blooded persecution of the head of the Austrian Government by the Brown Shirts and then has taken over the Government itself. Why? What had Austria done? Was that done because Austria had armed herself? No; certainly not. It was done because she had not armed enough. That is why war was thrust upon her. She did not invite war. She did not do anything to bring it about. She simply slept while the others prepared.

Mr. President, after seeing the situation as we saw it on those two committees, the one in the House and the one in the Senate, I think we would be unpatriotic if we did not come back and tell the Members on the floor the truth about the thing as we saw it, and we would be sleeping on our rights as patriotic citizens.

Here is the very barest, leanest preparation for defense, and it is made with a full consideration of the natural protection that the two oceans give us. That is taken into consideration. It is also taken into consideration that we are not expecting an air raid immediately. That is not what we fear. It is simply that when you are not armed, then you can expect attack. We do not expect it to come in our country. We know where it would come to us. We know it would come through the Latin-American countries.

I want to point out that we have never drawn a gun to enforce the Monroe Doctrine. Why have we been able to enforce it without that? Because of a psychology which existed. That is what the bill does—it creates a psychology. We saw Japan outrage helpless China. The Chinese are a docile, peace-loving people. We saw them blasted, we saw their homes wrecked, we saw the burnt earth in China.

We have seen all that. We have seen outrages upon humanity which would pale the occurrences depicted on history's pages, such as when Tamerlane finished his pyramid of 70,000 human skulls and stood at the gates of Damascus. It seemed then that the sun of civilization itself was setting in seas of blood. But when the dictator nations piled up a greater pyramid of human lives than was ever contemplated by the barbarian brains of old, it caused us to be resentful. Yet we held our tempers. It made the blood of every red-blooded American boil. That is when the President made his famous quarantine speech at Chicago, a speech that so many refer to as indicating he had changed his attitude. He has not changed that attitude. He is still for the same things. In that quarantine speech he threw the weight of American influence on the side of peace and the moral influence of America against those aggressor nations. That is what that speech did and nothing more.

The people of our country approve it, because what has been done so outraged humanity, it made every American want to speak to those dictators from the mouth of cannon, with flames of fire, but instead we maintained our composure and sent them a calm, regular note from the State Department urging peace. And then some have the nerve even to accuse our President of reversing his attitude and wanting war, when nothing of the kind is the case.

Mr. President, the House retracted on Guam, and in my opinion, that was an unfortunate thing, because of the psychology the inclusion of Guam in the bill had abroad. I do not know anything about whether, from a military standpoint, it would be a good thing to fortify Guam or not, but I know, from a psychological standpoint, it was a bad thing to retract on that point. I hope we can replace that provision in the Senate.

If we now retract, after the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate almost unanimously raised the ceiling—not the average, but the ceiling, to a maximum of not over 6,000 planes—if we retract on that, then how much more will the press of the dictator nations say we are afraid; and the psychological result will be more and more aggression toward our Latin-American countries. It is not an impossibility that it might result in us having to exercise military force in order to carry out the Monroe Doctrine if they once think we have adopted a vacillating policy. We know that a firm hand prevents war. It was Teddy Roosevelt who at one time asked the German Government to get their battleships out of the Mexican waters. They were dilatory in their answer. He put a deadline—"Get them out in 24 hours." Still there was a sort of a vacillating note. He said, "If that fleet is not under sail in 8 hours"—I believe it was—"we will open fire." In less than that time the fleet was under sail. Thus a firm hand at the throttle prevented war.

I recommend that we accept the committee amendment.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, under the order heretofore entered, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 11:30 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Saturday, March 4, 1939, at 11:30 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We draw near to Thee, our all-wise and loving Father, with grateful testimony for Thy goodness. So marvelous are Thy mercies and their manifestations that our hearts say: "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow us all the days of our life." Let the blessed thought inspire us to renewed efforts and consecration. Hear us, for since the ages began Thou hast heard the voices of this world. Thou art the refuge from all who bear false witness, from all who judge without knowledge, and from all who hate. Fill us with Thy spirit, with a new purpose, with new zeal and ardor, and let us reach forth toward a better manhood. Grant, O merciful Giver, that the inward and divine power of truth may be infused into every needy and hungry heart. May we do good when it tries our faith, may we do good when we are lightly esteemed among men, may we do good when no word is spoken and the response is noiseless, may we do good even as our Master did. In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3743) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate further insists upon its amendments Nos. 17 and 18 to the foregoing bill, disagreed to by the House; asks a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES

Mr. COCHRAN, from the Select Committee on Government Organization, reported the bill (H. R. 4425) to provide for reorganizing agencies of the Government, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 120), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the report on the bill (H. R. 4425) to provide for reorganizing agencies of the Government, and for other purposes, I ask unanimous consent that the minority members of this committee may be permitted to file their minority views and that they be printed with the majority views.

The SPEAKER. How long a period of time does the gentleman desire to file the minority views?

Mr. TABER. Until, say, 6 o'clock tonight, or something like that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and, of course, I am not going to object, may I ask when it is intended to call up this measure?

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] it has not been definitely determined when this will be called up. We hope to make an announcement on that matter during the day.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Some time today we will be advised when this bill will be brought up for consideration?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short quotation on one side of a sheet from the hearings on social-security legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a list of the former service men of the Spanish-American War, the Mexican punitive expedition, and the World War in the Seventy-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include two short editorials from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON]?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to make an announcement publicly to the House and to the majority leader. The Joint Committee on Printing took up the matter of placing editorials in the RECORD. I stated to the Members on the Senate side it was not fair for us to get after the majority leader on this side; that the Senate should take some action. I am advised by the Senators on the committee that within 3 weeks they will try to take the matter up with the Senate, and we hope for some favorable action. I want to make this statement so that the majority leader will know that all of our seeming animosity is only in the nature of the best of friendship. It is for the best interest of the public and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD certain remarks I expect to make later in the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. LEWIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include brief radio talks made by ex-Congressman Binderup and the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial on the social-security problem by the editor of the Glendale Star.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW]?

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that general debate run not more than 1 hour and 45 minutes. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS]?

Mr. POWERS. The time to be equally divided?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time was consumed yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has used 1 hour and 37½ minutes. The gentleman from New Jersey has used 2 hours and 22½ minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I realize it would not be fair to divide the time today equally, but I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we have requests on this side of the House for 50 minutes. Suppose the gentleman modify his request and ask that the time for general debate extend not over 2 hours; and then, if we finish before the conclusion of the 2-hour period, we can immediately start reading the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. That is satisfactory, and all the time used in general debate is to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4630; and pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill shall extend not to exceed 2 hours, the time on the basis of the whole debate to be divided equally between himself and the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, I just want it understood with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the 50 minutes I have here allotted will be granted me.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4630, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to a member of the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, my remarks today will be on the Air Corps of the Army principally, but will deal generally with the subject of airplanes for all services.

Mr. Chairman, I hope when the time comes to take positive action upon the provision of funds to increase our air forces, Army and Navy, the House will not be stampeded into pursuing a course that will mean equipping ourselves with vast numbers of planes which will be worthless 2 or 3 years from now.

Of course, if we are planning to send forces to Europe, that is one thing; but if we are building because some may feel there is danger of Europe, or some part of Europe, coming over here, we are simply wasting public money and approaching that much nearer to complete bankruptcy.

How many airplanes has Germany? How many airplanes has any European power? Who has seen them? Who has counted them? Who can speak authoritatively as to their superior characteristics, their superior speed? When did nations begin disclosing this sort of information in a way that all who run may read? Let me read from the report on this bill of last year. That report was dated March 23, 1938, less than a year ago.

There is evidence in the possession of the committee that we greatly excel any power in the world in naval aviation, and that, from the standpoint of project airplanes on hand, on order, and remaining to be ordered under funds heretofore made available, both Army and Navy, we are only excelled by the British Empire.

What was that statement based on? It was based on confidential information supplied to the Committee on Appropriations by the Intelligence Office of the Chief of Naval Operations. Not on general statements, but on detailed figures submitted and represented to be authentic.

We maintain military and naval attachés in every important foreign capital in Europe. At some we have more than one and at the principal ones we also maintain air attachés. In God's name, what have these attachés been doing in the space of less than 12 months, unbeknown to them, a complete reversal of the picture has taken place and one power which ranked below Russia and Italy in the confidential report to which I refer is now represented to have a force the equal of almost the combined forces of all of the other large powers of the world? I understand this alleged astonishing superiority in the size of this nation's air force was unknown to this Government as late as last October and it was only recently that this supposed reversal in estimates was made.

I am not saying that these reports are not true; I am disposed to doubt their accuracy. I do say this: If they are true, the attachés who have been asleep on the job should be eliminated from the service, and I suggest that the Committee on Military Affairs of this body may very well call these officers before it and demand an accounting.

Mr. Chairman, I have a suspicion that some propagandist in the aviation industry is back of all this urge to build up a vast air force. It has been frequently stated that such propagandists in other industries have already been under suspicion in times past of inspiring programs for building up the surface Navy. At one time such a propagandist was in attendance at an arms limitation conference and was known to be quite active throughout its sessions. Why such a suspicion? What are the facts? This Budget began to take definite form last autumn just about the time the news broke about the alleged tremendous strides that had been made in aviation by Germany and Italy. At that time the Army and Navy were approaching their airplane objectives. It became obvious from a careful review of the planes on hand by both services that business from these sources would be confined to replacement airplanes. Planes last longer today than formerly and attrition will occur principally from crashes, and crashes today are not so numerous as formerly. Let me illustrate to you what the industry had to look for from the Army. On the basis of funds heretofore made available and the funds asked for in the pending Budget, apart from the supplemental estimates, these are the Army's predicted delivery figures as shown by War Department justifications:

Fiscal year 1939-----	673
Fiscal year 1940-----	285
Fiscal year 1941-----	286
Fiscal year 1942-----	77

Looking at the picture from another standpoint, the same justifications indicate that the planes on hand and on order June 30, 1940, will be 2,392, exclusive of National Guard planes—more than 200 planes above the well-known Army program. With the life of the plane estimated at 8 years and crashes fairly small as they have been in recent years, it would take about 300 planes each year, or perhaps less than that number, as a fairly accurate figure for the future replacement program in the Army. It is evident that this is not a very inviting picture to industry. After the Budget was made up and presented we were suddenly awakened and told we are going to the bow-wows unless we started immediately to building airplanes. Pronto, we get a supplemental estimate of $50,000,000 to build 565 airplanes over and above what we have been continuously told was the authorized strength of airplanes for the Army, and we were further told that the money should be made immediately available.

I do not wish to do anyone an injustice. I hope this urge has nothing back of it but the highest patriotic motives. But why, in the name of heaven, are we now short on airplanes unless we are planning to fight overseas, is beyond my comprehension. There is not a plane in Europe today that can come over here and attack us and get back. If the Navy cannot prevent the establishment of an air base sufficiently near us for such an attack to be made from the air, something is radically wrong with it.

What of our air forces? I am one of those who still give high place in our scheme of military defense to the two oceans which isolate this hemisphere from other lands. The day has not yet come when we need fear air raids from across the seas. Of course, there are foreign aircraft which can cross the Atlantic nonstop. But there are none that can cross the Atlantic and return without refueling.

We, too, have aircraft—military aircraft—which can do the same thing, but it must be borne in mind that foreign military airplanes—by far the greater portion of them—are designed and built for missions not relatively far from national boundaries; for use against adjacent or practically adjacent powers. Their radius of action is designedly short. Fuel loads are cut down to make room for munitions. We have nothing to fear of such aircraft so long as they cannot base near our borders, and if our Navy as at present constituted cannot prevent that, it should be scrapped. I hardly think we should pause to consider attacks by airplanes launched from airplane carriers against our country. They are the most vulnerable of all navy surface craft, as they present the best air target. No sensible nation would permit one to come within striking distance of an enemy coast line unless it was prepared to sacrifice the ship and its aircraft. There again I should say we have been recklessly squandering public funds, if we cannot depend upon the Navy, afloat and aloft, supported by Army aviation, to render negligible, if not impossible, any damage from that quarter.

It was understood until this year that the authorized strength of our air force is 5,320 useful or serviceable airplanes. That number has by this bill been increased to 5,855. That number divides 2,855 Army and 3,000 Navy. The latter number was increased, and I think unwisely so, in the Naval Expansion Act, approved last May, from 1,910. I should have given the increase to the Army, because I think the Navy is wasting a lot of money on slow and cumbersome seaplanes, and I think military defense would be better served by putting that money into faster and more easily maneuvered landplanes.

It is my firm conviction that 5,855 airplanes of the right types are adequate for our peacetime needs, and I should like to add that unless we do not wish to avoid bankruptcy we should get out of the notion of going much beyond that number. Fifteen to twenty thousand military airplanes, their upkeep, ground crews, and bases would bankrupt this or any other nation in the world today.

There is much hysteria abroad. There is need for reason to assert itself. We can do much to improve our peacetime air force, and there is much we can do and should do to pave the way for its rapid augmentation if and when a genuine need should arise.

Mere numbers of planes do not mean anything. Types and performance and rapid production facilities, and types that lend themselves to rapid production, should be our chief concern, plus a trained reserve of personnel. Today we have on hand and on order a multiplicity of types for identical missions, all, or practically all, of different performance qualities. We have no adopted type or design for a particular mission. We buy a certain number of a particular design today and tomorrow an improved design comes out and we buy a certain number of them, and in the end we shall wind up with a heterogeneous conglomeration. I maintain that the Congress has determined that we should have an air force, collectively speaking, of a certain number of airplanes, not on paper but actually on hand. Under the procurement systems in both services, however, purchases have been long deferred awaiting new developments. If there has been delay in purchasing planes, it is not because the money has not been forthcoming. Unquestionably, we have too many types and I ascribe that partly, at least, to the domination of the land and sea arms where there is a disposition to disregard the growing stature and importance of the air arm, which has outgrown simply "an adjunct" stage and has become almost a coordinate arm.

Before making further large purchases I should advocate the appointment of a director or coordinator of procurement. This official should immediately get the two services together and fix upon the missions for which planes are needed, and the number of planes deemed necessary to have on hand in peacetime for such missions, and then he should have supervision of their procurement. I should not clothe this official with any powers over purely military questions. He should, however, be the arbiter of any differences involving military questions, his decision to be subject to change only by the President. Here at the outset we should get away from overlapping, and we should be assured of a dual force built, to the extent practicable, with the thought of one being complementary to the other. The missions should be narrowed as much as possible, having in view the practical question of wartime production.

With this start, I should expect the director of procurement to proceed to buy to the extent that available funds permitted the full incomplete quotas of planes for particular missions of the then proven best current designs. If the number were appreciable, I should deliberately fix a delivery date sufficiently advanced as to compel the contractor to sublet a portion of the work to other manufacturers in order to keep as many equipped establishments going as possible. This, most likely, would make the farmed-out planes cost more, and the contract should provide for such a contingency.

The foremost consideration at all times should be the enlarged demands in the event of national emergency. At all times a make of plane for each mission should be designated as standard and the expense incurred of providing patterns, mechanical devices, and other necessities essential to its production in the designer's plant or other plants to meet predetermined wartime needs. Then, in advancement of the art and science, and to make sure of thoroughly modern replacements, Federal and private research and design staffs should be continually encouraged and new types built in sufficient numbers for thorough test and trial. Study also should be made of short cuts in wartime production, both in manufacturing processes and by eliminating features which it might be better to dispense with than unduly to delay production.

We should strive toward powerfully supercharged airplanes capable of flying at high altitudes at maximum speed. By this I mean altitudes of 20,000 feet and speeds of 300 miles per hour and more. High rates of speed at low altitudes and low speeds at high altitudes are relatively unimportant. I advocate entrance in the Schneider and Pulitzer air races by our military planes so that we can find out if we can compete with foreign planes and learn real lessons from the competition. I advocate that all planes should be powerfully supercharged so that they can fly out of range of antiaircraft guns.

Expensive air bases are not necessary in our plan of military defense. They are targets for adversaries and to achieve protection air bases must go underground. In modern war, airplanes must be able to hide, to take off and land from fields or roads not necessarily adjacent to concealed air bases. In all instances air bases should be located at least 150 miles from the coast.

I advocate also increased aviation in the National Guard. In this organization the expense would be one-tenth of what it costs the Regular Army. National Guard men are paid only for the time they fly—not 365 days a year. They are used to the conditions of their own localities. For example, a National Guard air unit in Alaska would be more effective and very much less expensive than a Regular Army air unit there because the personnel would be conditioned to the climate and terrain. This would hold for National Guard units all over the country, each in their own locality. Therefore, it seems logical to have at least one modern air unit in the National Guard in each State in the Union, and in some States even more than one unit.

Mr. Chairman, it is agreed that this country should possess an adequate air force; one that is capable of immediately taking the offensive—for the airplane is an offensive weapon. Such a force should likewise be efficiently operated. The personnel—officers and enlisted men—should, in the main, be made up of capable young men. The planes should be up to date in both speed and performance. Extra emphasis should be placed on research and development so that ways and means of producing airplanes quickly and in considerable numbers can be attained and this can be done without attempting to keep plants producing in peacetime at a rate that would answer the increased demands of an emergency. The Army and Navy certainly have enough ability in their organizations to work out successfully this problem. All this fanfare about building an air force second to none when no air power is nearer our shores than 3,000 miles seems to be particularly unfortunate. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Lewis] such time as he may desire.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a statement concerning what has been done by the city of Denver and its citizens in cooperation with the Army in regard to the Air Corps Technical School, now known as Lowry Field, established at Denver by act of Congress, approved August 26, 1937 (Public, 394, 75th Cong.). I am glad to be able to report that Denver has taken great pleasure in more than fulfilling all its promises.

LOWRY FIELD, THE NEW AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL AT DENVER, COLO.

When the matter of establishing a new Air Corps Technical School first came up for consideration, various cities were considered. A board of Air Corps officers, selected by the General Staff and the Chief of the Air Corps, visited 57 cities in the United States; and, after months of investigation and study, reported that Denver was the most suitable place for the location of the new Air Corps Technical School. At that time the Denver Chamber of Commerce and other civic organizations, and the mayor and council of Denver authorized me, as Denver's representative in the Congress, to assure the War Department and the Congress that, if the new Air Corps Technical School should be established in or in the vicinity of our city, Denver would donate to the Federal Government, for the use of the air school, 1 square mile of land suitable for a site, with certain large and valuable buildings thereon, and would also donate, for purposes of an aerial gunnery and bombing range, 100 square miles of land on the plains, at a location to be approved by the Army Air Corps.

Subsequently, as a result of the rapid development in the size and speed of airplanes, it was determined that an area of 1 square mile would not be quite sufficient as a site for the school proper and the landing runways. Accordingly the civic organizations and public officials of Denver, after consultation, authorized me to assure the War Department and the Congress that, if it was the desire of the Air Corps and the Army to have for the school proper a larger site, to wit, 1½ square miles in area, Denver and its citizens would be very pleased to acquire and to donate to the United States, without any expense whatsoever to the Federal Government, such larger area for the school site in addition to the 64,000 acres on the plains for an aerial gunnery and bombing range.

Some of our friends in the Congress, perhaps jocularly, and yet, I surmise, with a tinge of sincerity, suggested that we would not be able to fulfill our promise.

DENVER HAS DONATED 1½ SQUARE MILES OF LAND FOR THE SCHOOL SITE AND 100 SQUARE MILES FOR A BOMBING RANGE

It is my pleasure to inform the House today, and to state for the RECORD, that Denver has secured, at its own expense, and has turned over possession to the United States, 1½ square miles of land, in a single compact rectangular tract for the school site proper and for the runways. The northwest corner of this tract is 6½ miles southeast of the main post-office building in Denver. The tract is 1 mile north and south and 1½ miles east and west. The westerly 1 square mile of this school site is in the city of Denver; the easterly one-half square mile, immediately contiguous, is within the county of Arapahoe, Colo.

In addition to the school site proper, possession has been acquired, and there is in process of conveyance to the Federal Government an area of 100 square miles—64,000 acres—on the plains several miles east and southeast of the school site, in a location approved by the officers of the Air Corps and largely selected by them, for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range.

At the northwesterly corner of this bombing range and connected with the main part of the range by a wide corridor is an auxiliary landing field, of 640 acres, or 1 square mile.

In addition to these tracts Denver has acquired and has donated to the United States a small, separate tract for use as the site for a radio range beacon to guide airships safely to the school at night. Denver has also acquired and has donated to the United States a strip of expensive land within the city limits, one-half mile long, for extension to the north of the north-and-south runway at the school site proper.

It has been no small task to get together these large tracts of land. The bombing range alone is as large in area as was the original District of Columbia. You will recall that the United States Constitution provides, article I, section 8, for a Federal District "not exceeding 10 miles square," containing 100 square miles. As a result of the retrocession of about 30 square miles to Virginia in 1846, the present area of the District of Columbia is only about 70 square miles.

On the lands acquired for this aerial gunnery and bombing range, were approximately 100 farms and ranches including many on which were dwellings in which the owners and their forebears had lived for 70 years or more. The selection and acquisition of these lands was in charge of Mayor Ben F. Stapleton and a committee of the board of councilmen and the city attorney of Denver, in consultation with officers of the Air Corps. The legal proceedings have been entirely in the hands of Malcolm Lindsey, Esq., the city attorney of Denver, and his staff.

Originally it was necessary to bring some 58 condemnation suits, and 11 other suits were instituted, making a total of 69. I am pleased to be able to report that last week all of these condemnation suits except 13 had been disposed of, either by trial or settlement out of court. Possession of all lands was, of course, acquired by court order immediately on filing condemnation proceedings.

The correction of any flaws in the titles has been, of course, a very tedious process, all of which has been handled by the city attorney and his staff. After obvious flaws in the titles have been corrected, the abstracts are referred to the representative of the Department of Justice. Any further corrections that the Department of Justice asks to have made are being made, all at the expense of the city of Denver, in accordance with our promise.

THIS DONATION, GLADLY MADE, HAS COST DENVER ABOUT A MILLION DOLLARS

The people of Denver, at the city election in May 1935 authorized a bond issue of three-quarters of a million dollars, all of which was sold at a premium and at a very low rate of interest. This $750,000 proved to be not sufficient, and subsequently there have been transferred from time to time from the general fund of the city, additional amounts in various installments which have increased Denver's cash outlay up to the present time to $985,000.

Furthermore, the city has put at the disposal of, or has allocated to this work of collecting these lands and correcting the titles, the force not only of the city attorney's office, but also of other city departments. This has somewhat increased the cost of operation of these regular departments and has increased the cost to the city of this gift to the Federal Government to well over a million dollars.

During the course of the proceedings, in both the House and the Senate, some Members from States other than Colorado, who were opposed to establishing this new Air Corps Technical School in Denver, expressed the opinion that Denver would not be permitted, under the Colorado laws, to use the city's funds for this purpose. But the Supreme Court of Colorado did not agree with our solicitous friends in the Congress. The highest court in Colorado upheld these expenditures.

Coming now to the buildings on the tract which is the site of the school proper and the landing runways: In the north-west corner of this tract are 10 large, substantial, and expensive buildings which were erected some years ago for purposes of a sanatorium. This sanatorium was closed about 1930.

SUBSTANTIAL EXISTING BUILDINGS ON THE LAND DONATED HAS SAVED THE GOVERNMENT MUCH MONEY AND TIME

With slight alterations, which have been made, these buildings have been found to be entirely suitable in all respects for the use of the Army for barracks and for classrooms. They are now and for several months have been in use by the Air Corps personnel and students.

I have here for inspection by all Members interested aerial photographs of this group of buildings.

The presence of these buildings on this site has saved the United States several hundred thousand dollars in money, besides the element of time—very precious in these days of rapid expansion of the Air Corps.

DENVER IS FULFILLING ALL ITS PROMISES TO THE CONGRESS

This new Air Corps Technical School is now and for over a year last past has been in operation. Some of the needed additional buildings are now being constructed.

In addition to fulfilling Denver's express promises, it has given very great pleasure to our citizens and to the municipal government of Denver to do certain other things, which I trust it is entirely proper for me, as the representative of Denver, to mention.

The withdrawal of considerable valuable property from the tax rolls of Denver has reduced pro tanto the revenue derived by the city from taxes. But it has been Denver's very great pleasure to cooperate with the Federal Government to that extent. And, of course, the aerial gunnery and bombing range of 100 square miles, in the adjacent county of Arapahoe—a tract larger than the present District of Columbia, bought by Denver and donated to the Federal Government—has reduced tax revenues in that county to a certain extent.

But Denver and the nearby counties have been glad to do everything that they have done and are doing. Such has always been, and I trust always will be, the attitude of Denver and of our neighboring counties in welcoming to our city and vicinity and to Colorado any activities of the Federal Government.

THE STATE OF COLORADO AND THE SEVERAL COUNTIES, AS WELL AS DENVER, HAVE BEEN COOPERATING FULLY WITH THE WAR DEPARTMENT FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF LOWRY FIELD

The State of Colorado, through its highway department, and the adjacent counties, through their boards of commissioners, have cooperated by relocating State and county roads which formerly traversed the bombing range.

All telephone, power, and telegraph lines in the vicinity of the Air School that the Air Corps regarded as possible flying hazards have either been removed or put underground by the public utilities.

Denver's municipal authorities have expressed to the War Department and to the Air Corps officers a willingness to vacate certain streets, if desired by the Army authorities. Denver has paved certain other streets for the convenience and use of this Air Corps Technical School. Under our zoning ordinances Denver has rezoned certain property in the vicinity of the school, as requested by the Army authorities.

When completed, three of the four landing runways at Lowry Field will each be $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles long. The fourth runway will be $1\frac{1}{16}$ miles long. A year ago, pending the completion and paving of these runways and the construction of the hangar now in course of erection at Lowry Field, our city placed at the disposal of the Army Air Corps one of the new hangars at the Denver Municipal Airport. This port, 2 miles north of the Air School, is one of the best equipped and, when enlargements now being made are completed, will be one of the largest airports in America.

Entirely at the city's expense, Denver is now extending a large new sewer to furnish ample sewerage facilities for the Air Corps Technical School.

Denver is also building a large new water conduit primarily to supply the Air School with an abundant supply of water, delivered at ample pressure for general use and for fire protection.

Denver has already built and now has in operation within three blocks of the Army Air School a new station of the city fire department, supplied with all modern equipment. Therefore there will be no serious danger from fire at Lowry Field. At a recent test, within 3 minutes after the alarm was put in, hose was laid and water being put on the building where there was assumed to be a fire. Therefore the Congress may feel assured that there will be no danger of any such fires as have recently occurred at some other Air Corps facilities.

The main buildings formerly used by the sanatorium are of brick and stucco with tile roofs; the powerhouse and some other smaller buildings are of concrete. There are also some smaller one-story buildings of wood. All these buildings have been remodeled, are well adapted to the use of the school, and are now in use. Except for the concrete buildings, all have floors, doors, and interior finishing of wood, and therefore are not absolutely and completely fireproof. Furthermore, the older type of planes and certain materials and stores which must be kept on hand are inflammable.

Although the fire risk is very slight, Denver wishes to cooperate with the Army in still further minimizing it.

I believe the House may be interested in this recital in outline of how Denver has fulfilled its promise to the Federal Government. This is especially pertinent in view of the fact that some Members in the House and others in the Senate appeared to question either our sincerity or our ability to perform the promises our people made through me as Denver's representative in the Congress.

Since Denver was a frontier village, whatever Denver has promised—that it has performed. Our city will always keep its promises.

In considering any proposals for additional appropriations for Lowry Field, or for any other Army facility in or in the vicinity of Denver, the Congress may be assured that our city government and our citizens are always willing to cooperate with the War Department and with the Army. We are happy that the War Department saw fit to suggest the establishment of this Air Corps Technical School, now named Lowry Field, in Denver. We are grateful to the Congress for adopting the suggestion. We will always try to show our spirit of cooperation by doing at least our full share. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY.]

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with the statement attributed to our Ambassador to England, Joseph P. Kennedy, when he told the British Government that drastic restriction of Jewish immigration into Palestine and the abolition of the British mandate over the whole land "would have a disastrous effect on public opinion in the United States."

The Balfour declaration which promised a national home for the Jewish people was made in the most trying period of the World War. It was made to bring before the Jews of the world the high sincere principles of the allied cause for democracy. It was made also from an allied point of view to counteract the evident counter efforts of the enemy themselves to win over the Jews in Germany who certainly had been treated by old Germany in a way that had won their allegiance.

The celebrated Balfour declaration was known to President Wilson and was discussed with our late Justice Louis Brandeis when the Balfour mission was in America. It was given to Lord Rothschild in a letter signed by Mr. Balfour to the effect:

His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a national home for Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.

The Balfour declaration therefore was made on November 2, 1917, and pledged the British Government to facilitate the establishment of this national home. It had the endorsement and approval of the United States. Its principles were accepted by the allied and associated powers. Those high ideals were incorporated in the treaty in which Turkey released control over Palestine. They were ratified by the treaty between Great Britain and the United States on December 3, 1924, which was proclaimed by the President on December 5, 1925.

Article 6 of that pact between the United States and Great Britain includes a promise by the British to facilitate Jewish immigration, and it also includes a statement to the effect that no change will be made affecting American interests in Palestine without the approval of the United States.

There is no question in my mind but that this solemn pact to world Jewry has not been fulfilled. Great Britain had a duty under the mandate and to the League of Nations to honor this solemn compact. The entire history of the mandate is a culmination of widespread and organized disorder with absence of the strong authoritative action on the part of the British amounting almost to implied dissent. It is my belief that had there been a sincere attempt to fulfill this mandate hundreds of thousands of the surplus Jewish population could have been established in the Palestine area.

No one who is familiar with the tremendous work done in the city of Tel-Aviv can help leave the subject without a realization of the sincere efforts of the Jews themselves to go to Palestine and there rebuild their fortunes and find peace and comfort. No one who has read Lord Melchett in his very temperate book, The Neighbor, can deem his suggestions unwise or impracticable.

He said that the Governments of Poland, Rumania, and Austria, and three smaller countries, all admit that they have a larger Jewish population than they can successfully deal with, and if this population was reduced by 40 to 50 percent, their problem would be solved. It was hoped that these surplus people might by their eventual presence in Palestine and the Trans-Jordan amount to 3,000,000. Obviously this was going to take a long period of time, but his was a long-range plan and his vision was equally as farsighted.

Here is a quotation:

After a 10-year period it is, therefore, possible to envisage the evacuation of German Jewry, and the material diminution of the overcrowded Jewries of eastern Europe. After a period of 15 years, one might say that a total solution of this problem presents itself on the basis of an emigration of 100,000 a year, rising to 200,000.

When one knows the views of Lord Melchett and sees the practical demonstration of Tel-Aviv, one can see the possibilities of the fulfillment of the psalm:

Hide me from the secret council of the wicked, from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity.

Lord Melchett was realistic enough to see that the Arabs who were there would be satisfied with nothing less than a complete repudiation and a tearing up of the mandate as far as the Jews were concerned, but he also pointed out the tremendous gains and benefits that have already been given to the Arabs by the modern settlements of the transported Jews. Tel-Aviv is the first commercial city in the country. It has a population of 150,000. It is the world's most arresting spectacle today.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, as the United States is a signatory to the convention with Great Britain, a pact signed by Calvin Coolidge as President and Secretary of State Frank P. Kellogg, I believe that that solemn document which has in its proclamation word by word the Balfour declaration and the existence of the mandate, makes us as high contracting parties insist that article 2 be fulfilled.

The mandatory shall be responsible for placing the country under such political, administrative, and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish national home, as laid down in the preamble, and the development of self-governing institutions, and also for safeguarding the civil and religious rights of all the inhabitants of Palestine, irrespective of race and religion.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, as certain as is the rising and setting of the sun in the heavens was the supernatural guidance of the Holy Ghost which brought about the election by the sacred College of Cardinals of Eugenio Cardinal Pacelli to the papacy.

The new pontiff, Pius XII, spiritual leader of nearly 400,000,000 Catholics throughout the world and the direct successor of St. Peter, is most worthy of his saintly, brilliant, and peace-loving predecessor, Pius XI.

A paragon of all that the faithful may expect of the priesthood, he transcends those expectations in that he is a statesman of the first magnitude. A scholar without peer and a humanitarian in whom is combined extreme kindness and understanding of the problems of mankind—virile and fearless—we pray that God will preserve him for a long and productive reign in His service and in the service of all humanity.

The great work of the late lamented Pius XI, tragically broken, will now continue with renewed emphasis upon peace and tolerance. A yearning, heartsick world will offer a prayer of thanksgiving to God in Heaven for this most timely and wise elevation of the Cardinal Secretary of State to the throne of St. Peter.

From the worldly point of view, the people of the United States, and, in fact, all peace-loving and democratic people throughout the world, can appreciate in Pius XII those qualities of simplicity, modesty, and straightforward and direct action which differentiate between a great man and those of mediocre qualities.

The whole world rejoices—a new day is dawning. Peace and good will among men and nations will be restored to a trouble-burdened world.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, not since northern survivors many years ago lauded the graves of Confederate dead and thus in the language of the beautiful poem, "banished our anger forever," have the chords of human sympathy been played upon as when President Roosevelt this week ordered a United States cruiser into service to convey the body of Ambassador Saito 6,000 miles overseas to his homeland. The morning papers today state that the Japanese Government has advised our Government that it "deeply appreciates and gladly accepts the President's friendly offer."

In the present state of the world, with the strident din of war drowning the feeble voice of peace and with criminations and recriminations fanning the roaring fires of hate, our President could have done nothing finer, nothing nobler, nothing grander.

In this act of the President the hearts of 130,000,000 Americans touch the hearts of 98,000,000 Japanese and the mystic language of heart speaking to heart says, "Let us be friends."

As an approach to world peace such simple but gracious acts of those in authority in handling world controls are worth more than all of the battleships and bomber airplanes we have built or ever will build, even though our navy yards and airplane factories were speeded a thousandfold.

It is said that "a little act of kindness makes the whole world kin," and the masses of every country, accustomed to associating cruisers with belching guns raining death and destruction, will rejoice to see an American cruiser sent to Japan on this mission of mercy. May we not hope—or if we cannot hope, may we pray—that the President's wise and thoughtful act will open the way to a better world concord, so that international differences which are crowding so thick and fast and bewilderingly upon us may be dispelled by mutual understanding rather than by resort to mass murder.

Saito living was an ambassador of good will. Saito dead may be the means of averting a horrible war.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I was intensely interested in the splendid presentation made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. The gentleman from Mississippi was chairman of the War Department subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee for a number of years. I know of no one in the House of Representatives who has a more thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the War Department and the needs of that Department. I wish to say just a word supplementing his statement.

General Arnold, Chief of the Air Corps, testified upon my questioning that it would cost $230,000,000 annually to operate, maintain, and replace an air force of 5,500 Army planes, 3,300 in the air and 2,200 in reserve. He testified that it costs $50,000 a year to operate and maintain every plane that we have in the air. This does not include replacement cost. If we should decide now or later to put the entire 5,500 planes in the air as an active force, it would cost us $110,000,000 a year more, or a total of $340,000,000 a year to operate, maintain, and replace this Army air force. When we add the 3,000 planes the Navy has, we have a total of 8,500 planes. There is no question in my mind, nor can there be in the mind of anyone who has studied the question, that the cost of replacing, operating, and maintaining such an air force will approach or probably exceed half a billion dollars a year. This is more than it cost to operate either branch of the service until recently, including their respective air forces.

However, I did not rise to speak on that phase of the bill. I wish to speak on the question of housing in the Army. I believe my record shows that I have not been unfriendly to the Army or to the protective forces of this country. However, when I see money wasted, when I see extravagance, I am going to hit it wherever I find it. [Applause.]

For the last 2 years, as a member of this subcommittee, I have protested to the Army about the exorbitant cost of Army housing. The only result I obtained was an ever-increasing cost.

Under our law as it stands today, the Army is limited to $8,500 for quarters for a noncommissioned officer, $12,500 for a company officer—that is, a lieutenant or a captain—and $14,500 for a field officer; that is, a major or a colonel.

This amount includes the cost of constructing the building but does not include the cost of the land. There is no financing charge, there is no charge for discount on trusts, there is no title expense included, but this figure simply represents the cost of the construction of the building.

In Panama we are proposing to erect quarters for noncommissioned officers at $9,700 for one family; quarters for company officers, $15,000, and field officers, $17,400 for each officer. This does not include the cost of the land.

We are now engaged in a construction program with W. P. A. funds, and I have before me a break-down of that part of the funds which apply to quarters for noncommissioned and commissioned officers. This $65,000,000 W. P. A. program covers every phase of Army construction.

We have here, for instance, 699 noncommissioned officers' quarters, $8,624,000, or in other words, an average of $12,380 for each noncommissioned officer's quarters. This is in the United States.

I have here a break-down of officers' quarters. Eighty field officers' quarters costing $1,384,000, and 319 company officers' quarters, $5,517,000, at an average of $17,300 each. Bachelor quarters cost $8,150. This does not include the cost of land. It does not include the cost of financing. There is no cost with respect to examining titles, appraisals, and so forth. That little high-school student whom you appoint to West Point is coming out in 4 years' time as a lieutenant and in 2 or 3 years, if married, may occupy quarters that cost $17,300 each.

I would like to ask how many Members of Congress have a home that costs $17,300, plus the cost of the land, the financing, and other charges. I know that here in the city of Washington, with the high building costs, you can go out on Massachusetts Avenue or elsewhere in excellent localities where they are putting up new homes. They will put you up a mansion there for $17,300, which includes the cost of the land, the cost of the abstract of title, financing, and other costs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the gentleman made any inquiry to ascertain how much in the way of additional cost in the matter of erecting these buildings is due to the act of Congress known as the Walsh-Healey Act? I am informed that the construction costs of the United States Government under that act, both for the Army and the Navy, are increased by about 20 percent.

Mr. ENGEL. I do not know whether they are or not, but suppose they are increased by 20 percent, 20 percent of $17,000 is $3,400, and you are still up to about $14,000, and I am wondering how they can get around the limitation provided by law of $8,500 for a noncommissioned officer, $12,500 for a company officer, and $14,500 for a field officer.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I have not had the pleasure of hearing all the gentleman has said about the matter of expense of housing in the Army, but the matter has been before our committee for a number of years and we have heard a great deal of testimony on the subject. The argument I get in justification, if there is any justification of these expensive buildings, is that they are built on Government property as permanent structures, and that they are not built for 20 or 30 years, but built for a century, and that the cost of repairs and insurance and things of that kind on them is largely provided for in the cost of the building itself, because they are built so substantially that they will not require any repairs.

Mr. ENGEL. Yes; but the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the gentleman is chairman and over which he presides so ably and efficiently, has decided, with all those facts before it, that $8,500 is right for noncommissioned quarters, $12,500 for a company officer, and $14,500 for a field officer.

Here we come back and find $12,380 for a noncommissioned officer, which is nearly $4,000 above their allowance, and $17,300 for company and field officers, $17,300 for a dwelling for one officer.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The Military Affairs Committee has no power or jurisdiction over the question of what a house shall cost. The only way that could be controlled would be through the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations could place in a bill a proviso that the funds shall be limited to certain purposes, with certain limitations.

Mr. ENGEL. There is a provision in the law, I think, that came from the gentleman's committee, which limits the amount which they can spend.

Mr. MAY. I was not aware of that.

Mr. ENGEL. That is a matter of legislation. I have been protesting in our committee for 3 years. I want to say to you that with 165,000 Home Owners' Loan Corporation homes being foreclosed upon, with 83,000 home owners actually dispossessed by the H. O. L. C., it is an outrage to spend $17,300 for a company officer's quarters and $12,380 for a noncommissioned officer's quarters and make the people who are dispossessed help pay taxes to build these quarters.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. ENGEL. I want you to interrupt me. If the gentleman from Kentucky has any pertinent facts, I want them in the RECORD.

Mr. MAY. No doubt the gentleman recalls that last year, in the interest of Army housing, so that it would be taken care of out of the vast expenditure for relief purposes, I had a bill that would have earmarked $130,000,000 of that money for Army housing, with the provision that it be made in the ordinary plans. The gentleman was very enthusiastic for it, as I remember.

Mr. ENGEL. I did not express myself on the gentleman's bill. I am willing to go along with the decent housing program. However, I cannot see on what ground we can justify the expenditure of $12,380 for a noncommissioned officers quarters and $17,300 for an officers quarters. I think there ought to be some explaining done on the part of somebody.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I will not need all the 10 minutes this morning. Certainly there is very little left to say after the discussion we have had on this bill.

I do want to take the opportunity, however, to compliment the committee on the completeness of the report they have given to us. At least, to a new Member, all of these reports are very interesting. I perhaps should say too interesting.

I started to read this report last night and the next thing I knew it was a quarter of three o'clock this morning.

I want to mention one item in this bill under the heading of "Pay of the Army," and raise the question as to why it is necessary to disallow the request for 31 additional flight surgeons, or to give those flight surgeons a flight-pay status. I understand it involves a total saving of $44,640.

I believe that the flying officers of our Army have no better friends than the flight surgeons. They play a very important part in developing and creating morale, in looking after the health of the flying personnel. I believe that the tremendous improvement—and I think you will all agree that there has been tremendous improvement in the past 20 years—in the morale of our flying personnel is partly, if not largely, due to the fact that 90 percent of our Air Corps officers are now flying officers. We have eliminated all the unnecessary "kee-wees," as we used to call them 20 years ago. It seems to me very important that the flight surgeons should have this flying status, not so much because of the dollars and cents involved, but so that when they get into a plane, perhaps in response to news or notice of a crash, they are undertaking an authorized flight and not an unauthorized risk. It is my understanding that these flight surgeons without flying status, of course, are not paying the additional premium required on their own life insurance, and it means that if they go on one of these unauthorized flights and meet with an accident resulting in their death, in many cases they would have voided their own life insurance.

In the past 2 years more than 200 members of our Air Corps have been transported under the direction of flight surgeons in airplanes. I do not question at all but what those flying surgeons will continue to fly unauthorized flights if a call comes for their services. I have the highest regard for the flight surgeons attached to our Air Corps. I know they are more concerned with other factors than the extra pay that would be given to them on that type of work. I also feel that those flight surgeons should be permitted and authorized to fly at every opportunity, as it gives them a chance to actually observe and study the mental and physical reactions of the pilot. It gives them an observation that they cannot get any other place, in spite of the modern equipment that we now have.

I do not like to plead for increased appropriations, certainly not in connection with the bill before us, but I do believe it would be good common sense to cancel one airplane at a cost of $50,000 and give us 31 additional flight surgeons who will be authorized to fly whenever it is necessary. [Applause.] I am not one who believes that our participation in a war is inevitable.

I believe that we as Members of Congress, and certainly all officials of the Government, could contribute to bringing about our desired peace, if we would all be more guarded in our remarks, in our thinking and discussing matters of national defense and foreign relations in particular. I believe that our country can remain neutral if we make up our minds that we are going to. It has been demonstrated in European countries much smaller than ours and close to the battleground of the World War, countries which have managed to keep out of alliances and entanglements. I believe that if Congress is to carry out the wishes of the American people we should devote our thinking to carrying out measures of peace, and that we think of the maintenance of national defense from the standpoint of maintaining peace. If we do this we shall at least in some measure bring about the end desired by our people.

I confess that I am just as much confused and puzzled as are many other Members to know just what items of this appropriation are absolutely necessary for purposes of defense. I am sure there is not a Member of either House who is not willing to vote every dollar necessary if he can feel in his heart that it is a defensive measure. Beyond that not many of us want to go.

In connection with the Air Corps of the Army I am very much interested, and I am an enthusiastic friend of civil aeronautics. Yesterday I introduced a resolution asking for the creation of a committee on air commerce and civil aviation. This resolution has been numbered 111. I respectfully urge the Members of the House to consider the importance of this resolution and the benefits to be obtained from such a standing committee. Certainly there can be no criticism of the way the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee have dealt with matters relating to civil aviation. That is a most important committee, a busy committee, and its membership numbers many prominent and able Members of this House. Certainly our air industry is going to grow. It has shown remarkable growth so far, and most of it has come about in the depression period and can be called depression growth. The present, I believe, is the time for Congress to give consideration to ways and means to help the industry direct its efforts and thoughts toward civil aviation. The Congress has created a Civil Aviation Authority which is going to be a very useful administrative bureau. I can see untold value to result from a standing committee of the House to deal with civil aviation matters. In a very few years after the creation of such committee, we would have among its members men as expert in matters relating to aviation as we have men expert in military affairs on the Committee on Military Affairs.

The importance of the aviation industry should be apparent to all of us, because if there ever was a time in our history when we need new industries it is right now. The aviation industry is capable of great expansion and development and should have every possible assistance by Congress. I do not mean financial assistance, but moral support, so that the industry can go ahead. They will do more than their share in taking up some of the slack and providing employment. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I am sure every Member of this House wants our Army and Navy to have the best airplanes in the world. We want them built of the best material and by the best workmen that can be provided.

As we are now about to enter upon an extensive program for construction of airplanes for the Army and Navy, it is appropriate that attention be called to the advantages in the use of stainless steel, in the hope that the Army and Navy will give immediate consideration to its use for mass production of seaplanes and landplanes.

This basic material is now out of the experimental stage; for, not counting individual experiments, there are two companies in the United States today who have spent millions of dollars in the research and development of stainless-steel fabrication which has been successfully applied not only to rail cars, superstructures of cruisers and destroyers, but to aircraft as well. Twenty-six trains have been built; in fact, the best trains we have in the United States are made of stainless steel.

For lack of time I will confine myself to a brief description of the work carried on thus far on various parts of land and marine aircraft made in stainless steel.

Our Air Corps has a fleet of Douglas twin-motor amphibians, seven of which have the wings made entirely of stainless steel. These planes have gone into service during the past 2 years. These wings have been very easily repaired when accidentally damaged.

In addition 77 pursuit planes have all movable tail surfaces and ailerons made of this material; 50 more sets were made for export.

A few months ago, in cooperation with the matériel division of the United States Army Air Corps of Dayton, the wing of a pursuit plane was developed and tested with success.

Five amphibians for sportsman use have been built in stainless steel. I have also learned that stainless-steel parts in considerable quantity are at this very moment being adopted and fabricated by leading aircraft manufacturers of very light commercial planes. This proves not only that the value of this metal has been recognized but that its cost can favorably compete with present materials used.

There is no excuse whatsoever, therefore, to further postpone the use of stainless steel, since it is definitely out of its experimental stage.

The advantages of this material have been enumerated to me as follows by experts in whom I have full confidence:

First. Its melting point is more than three and four-tenths times as high, which is a decided advantage in case of fire. It is common knowledge that at temperatures up to 1,000° F. the stainless steel shows but little variation of property, while the material we now use begins to lose strength rapidly at 400° F. or less.

Second. On the other hand, spot-welded stainless steel increases its strength value in direct proportion with the lowering of the temperature and with the tendency to fly at high level where zero temperatures are normal; the safety factor of the plane itself is, therefore, automatically increased.

Third. Finally, I call your attention to the fact that in at least two European countries the use of stainless steel has been adopted recently for a great number of component parts for both bombers and pursuit planes, while here in America, where we are the leaders in the use of stainless steel in many fields, its outstanding qualities are not being adequately recognized.

Fourth. It is far more corrosion-resistant than any other currently used material suitable for aircraft structure.

Fifth. It does not require any anodic treatment, which thus eliminates cost, complication, and specialized skills relating to the provision of heat-treating and anodizing equipment necessary for light alloys.

Sixth. From a comparative test conducted in the wind tunnel by the N. A. C. A. on a stainless steel wing panel and an ordinary wing panel, it was proven that welded stainless steel reduces the drag so effectively as to increase by 10 miles an hour the speed of a pursuit plane whose normal speed is 300 miles per hour.

Seventh. The heads of the rivets alone on a transport plane, DC-3, I have been told, absorb 240 horsepower, something we do not have to contend with in welded stainless steel. Of course, I know that flush rivets can be made, but I also know that their price is exceedingly high. Incidentally, there is now in existence welding equipment that can make 1,000 spot welds per minute.

Eighth. Contrary to that which results on the finished product in dural, no matter how many times the surface of stainless steel may be scratched from having walked over it, it is no way damaged. Whereas, in aircraft factories where the present alloy is used as the basic material, it is common practice to post signs reading, "Scratched material is scrapped material."

Ninth. Stainless steel can also be left exposed to the elements resting on sand or gravel, or near the sea; and its physical properties remain the same.

Tenth. The price of stainless steel is one-half that of dural; and besides this our Government should be keenly interested in the fact that we have in the United States more than six stainless-steel mills competing with one another who are ready to deliver material in any quantities.

In order to speed up production, I do not see any reason why the Army and the Navy should not give immediate authorization to the aircraft manufacturers to use both metals so as to enable the present aircraft manufacturers to gradually switch to stainless steel without upsetting present production.

I have also been informed by experts that stainless steel can be easily, and very satisfactorily, electrically welded and that therefore a tremendous amount of time can be conserved as compared with riveting; hence making it possible in any emergency to speed up production with a fewer number of men.

Therefore, I want to see that the companies in America who have spent millions of dollars for research work in stainless steel receive adequate production orders, enabling them to duplicate types of planes now made in dural and thus make it possible to recognize the advantages of stainless steel under the same service conditions.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

COMMUNISM—NAZI-ISM—FASCISM

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, judging from the appearance of the House, these remarks will be mainly for the RECORD, and that is all right with me. That is what I anticipated the other day on the remarks I made which have occasioned my reappearance on the floor today. A Member of Congress becomes habituated to the idea that he is immune from press publicity, and he is seldom wrong. I can say truthfully that the Nation-wide attention attracted by my remarks on Washington's Birthday about the Nazi rally in New York City was wholly unexpected. They seem also to have excited the ire of some gentlemen in the House who, like some of my critics, my mail critics, want to know where I stand on communism; and they want to know it in a way which causes some Members on the floor, my friends, to feel they are reflecting on my patriotism.

It will be impossible for me to answer the thousands of letters and telegrams, mostly commendatory, I have received from all over the United States on that speech; so I propose to answer it with a form letter. I ask unanimous consent to read this form letter as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, this form letter was sent to the editor of a Republican daily paper in my district, who was far from enthusiastic about my reelection last fall; but he has written me a letter on my Washington's Birthday speech which I shall treasure as long as I live. I hope in the letter, which I am about to read, to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin as to where I stand on communism to their satisfaction, even if the way in which I answer it does not satisfy them, as probably it will not. I read:

MARCH 1, 1939.

Mr. FRED E. WINSOR,

Editor, Chronicle-News, Trinidad, Colo.

MY DEAR MR. WINSOR: I regret that the very heavy volume of other work makes it impossible for me to write individual answers to the many thousands of letters and telegrams on my remarks in the House of Representatives on the Nazi meeting in New York City on February 20. I am therefore reduced to the necessity of a form answer, if they are to be answered at all.

The thing that fired my indignation to the speaking point was the newspaper pictures of Nazi storm troopers, the leaders of the New York meeting, in foreign military uniforms and insignia and floating a foreign flag before and above the American flag. Had it not been for the uniforms and flags I might have passed it over as just another of those things which, however, are becoming all too common in this country.

I shall have to content myself with an expression of sincere thanks to all who have written or wired me their approval of my stand on the New York meeting. I can assure you that if I had it to say over again I would retract no word. The only thing that could possibly be exaggerated about that meeting and the movement it represents is its power. There can be no exaggeration of its purpose. It is utterly un-American and anti-American.

It is an insult to the intelligence of the American people for the sponsors and sympathizers of such a gathering to characterize it as pro-American. Let no one be deceived; this movement is inimical to American institutions. The Constitution, the Congress, and the courts; freedom of speech, of religion, and of the press; and the Bill of Rights, priceless heritage of the centuries, have no place in its creed or its program, just as they have no place in the homeland of the movement.

Now for a paragraph about the content of the criticism I received. It is important to the consideration of the problem. Nearly all the critics wanted to know why I did not include communism, and they pretend to regard their movement as a first line of defense of Americanism against communism. One of the speakers at the New York meeting was quoted in the press as saying there is no middle ground between communism and Nazi-ism. On the other hand, the Communists seek to build up the position that communism is America's first line of defense against Nazi-ism. Each is using the other as the proverbial red herring.

My answer to both is that in the United States of America there is no middle ground, foreground, or background; there is only American ground. Communism, Nazi-ism, and fascism are alien to the genius, the traditions, the institutions, and the very thought of the American people. These three ideologies may differ in technique, but when we consider the vital things on which they agree, their identities, we need not quarrel among ourselves over the things wherein they differ. No worse despotisms ever cursed any civilization. There is no place for our America in either of their systems, if we may call absolute dictatorships, in which one man is the state and his will the law, by the name of system.

I would like at this point to refer to a similar characterization in a leading editorial on Russian atrocities in the Washington Post of yesterday. After reciting these conditions and the type of government which is responsible for them, this editorial states:

From this viewpoint communism, fascism, and Nazi-ism are identical, regardless of their essentially superficial differences. In each system a single party is supreme; its dominant members, vile though they may be, are ipso facto privileged persons. All who are not of the elect are without rights, safeguards, or reliable protection of any kind. Outright slavery, which at least placed a premium on preserving the individual's physical well-being, was by comparison a civilized system.

Such a system begins by crushing all opposition, proceeds to a framing of innocent people by those underlings who crave more power, and ends by swiftly destroying every human liberty, every safeguard against injustice which mankind has laboriously built up through centuries of concerted effort.

Mr. Chairman, the letter continues:

Apparently the time is at hand when Congress must take cognizance of the growing menace of these subversive activities and pass suitable legislation to deal with them. But we will be dealing with matters most vital to a free people, and we must exercise the greatest care not to supplant one evil with another and get a remedy worse than the disease, as in the case of the alien and sedition laws. Some things are clear. We want no secret armies in this country, no foreign military uniforms, no alien flag floating above the Stars and Stripes, no racial group fomenting strife against any other racial group. If the racial composition of this country does not suit them, let them go back to their own countries, which are being purged of all forms of alienism. We don't need them to preserve this country and its free institutions. That will be done by Americans who owe no allegiance to any foreign power or philosophy. I have every faith that such Americans are in the vast majority. These groups are warned not to mistake tolerance for acquiescence. America might wake up.

With my kindest regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

JOHN A. MARTIN.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few personal words. If my loyalty is sought to be questioned by the Nazis or their sympathizers, I am willing to parallel-column my record with the record of any man in their ranks.

I count it as incomparably my greatest good fortune that my parents, who were immigrants, came to these shores in time to bestow upon me the priceless heritage of birth on American soil. Perhaps my freedom from foreign entanglements is due in part to the fact that they came of a people who cannot be charged with any great love for a foreign power. They came from the Emerald Isle. My father enlisted and served in the Union Army before his naturalization. That may have been due in part to the proverbial love of his blood for a fight, but the fact of his service remains.

When this country entered the World War, I was 49 years of age, had already served in Congress, had a paying public and private law practice and had no military training whatever; yet I went out and recruited a volunteer battalion at my own expense, in which I served a year, and which saw service in France.

Since the war, and because of my service and subsequent activities, I have received actual membership in the American Legion and the Disabled American Veterans, and honorary membership in the United Spanish War Veterans and the Veterans of Foreign Wars. I was an organizer and charter member of the American Legion post in my home city and wrote its constitution and have been its post commander. I have served as a member of the national Americanism commission of the American Legion.

In the Sixty-first, Sixty-second, Seventy-third, Seventy-fourth, and Seventy-fifth Congresses I voted for every dollar in every appropriation bill for the upbuilding and maintenance of the national defense. My philosophy of the national defense was long since summed up in four words: America only and ready.

Mr. Chairman, I make these statements with no thought in mind of laying any special claims to patriotism. The World War forever fixed my faith in the loyalty and patriotism of the great majority of all groups of our citizenship, racial, religious, or otherwise. They stood the acid test. I saw it with my own eyes. I know it as I know that I live. I could fill this RECORD with proofs. I know that should another emergency arise they will close ranks, answer the call, and follow the flag wherever it may lead. Since they can die together in war why may they not live together in peace?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I was much interested this morning in the very splendid presentation of my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], with reference to the program for air defense in this country.

Last year when the expansion Navy bill was under discussion, I took the floor to make a few remarks in reference to the need for more coordination between the Army and the Navy air forces. Under the Baker Board recommendations, which provided for the Army having 2,320 planes, it was contemplated that the ratio between the Navy and Army should be about 60 percent for the Army and 40 percent for the Navy. Last year when a revision was made increasing the Navy air force, we authorized 3,000 planes for the Navy. This completely disrupted the proportion as contemplated by the Baker Board.

This year in the May bill the Army is authorized to have 5,500 planes, and this amount in the Senate has been increased to an authorization providing 6,000 planes. What the ultimate number will be, of course, we do not know at this time. What ultimate number the Navy will have we do not know.

Last year I made the statement that we should have in the Congress a coordinating committee on national defense which would afford more cooperation between the Navy committee functions and the Army committee functions. It is said that the Navy airplanes are supposed to go with the fleet. Of course, with the number of ships we have in the fleet, they could not possibly take on all of the naval aircraft which we are authorizing for the Navy.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me if we had a committee on national defense in the House consisting of, say, members from the Military Affairs Committee of the House, the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, and the Subcommittees on Military and Naval Appropriations, the whole committee acting together, would more nearly coordinate the functions of the Navy and Army, especially with reference to the air forces.

Mr. Chairman, this bill that we have under consideration and the authorization contained in it for Army planes does not contemplate, with the exception of 565 planes that were requested by the President in his supplemental estimate sent down this winter, any expansion over the 2,320 planes that were contemplated by the Baker Board recommendation. In 1926 there was an authorization of 1,800 planes. This, added to the 2,320 contained in the Baker Board recommendation, gives us 4,120 planes, which, plus the 565 contained in the supplemental estimate, makes 4,685 planes.

We need not become alarmed at this time about future expansion of the air force until we have built up to the point authorized at the present time. We have on hand as of December 31, 1938, project planes for the Army and the Organized Reserves 1,680 planes and for the National Guard 117, a total of 1,797 planes. There are project planes, obsolete but usable, 336; nonproject planes, some usable, for the Army, 31; planes condemned and not usable, 44; a total of 75; or a grand total of all project planes, usable, obsolete, and nonusable, of 2,208 planes.

As of December 31, 1938, we have planes on order but not delivered, 558; on schedule, not ordered, 348 planes under the 1939 appropriation bill, and under the regular 1940 bill, 219 planes, or 1,125 planes on order authorized but not delivered. Add to that the 565 planes under the supplemental estimate of the President and we have 1,690 planes on order or on schedule. If you add the 1,797 that we have on hand of all types, the 1,690 on order, not delivered and on schedule, this makes a total of 3,487 planes. The May bill as passed by the House authorized 5,500 planes. Of those 5,500 planes, as stated by General Arnold at page 300 of the hearings, 1,965 only will be operating combat planes, leaving 3,535 for transport, training, and other purposes.

I am calling these figures to your attention merely to show that it will take us a couple of years at least to complete this program. The bill that is now pending before you does not come up to the number of planes that are now under order and authorized.

Mr. Chairman, one of the things that worries me about the expansion of our national-defense program so far as the Army is concerned is what we are going to be confronted with in reference to the question of expensive upkeep and increased personnel. This bill that we have before us today is the normal Budget for 1940 only.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, in the Regular Army we have 165,000 enlisted men. In the National Guard we have 205,000, with an authorization to bring this number up to 210,000.

As an illustration of what an increase in personnel does so far as the expense of the Military Establishment is concerned, we took off 1 cent a day from the 45 cents per day rations, which resulted in a saving, under this bill, of $572,750. So you can see from this instance what personnel alone adds to the expense of national defense.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman spoke of a saving. Is it not a matter of fact that a great volume of relief money appropriated for relief purposes has been allocated to the Army and Navy, which will run into the hundreds of millions of dollars that the Army and Navy have received through relief appropriations?

Mr. TERRY. The Army has received some relief money for project work, building work, and things of that sort.

General Craig, at page 5 of the hearings, states:

The critical situation which has developed in world affairs since the preparation of these estimates has made it imperative to re-determine the minimum requirements of the armed forces of the United States to carry out the missions which they may be called upon to meet in an emergency. Studies are now under way in the War Department to determine the minimum personnel requirements of the peacetime establishment to carry out all of the tasks for which the War Department is responsible in time of peace and to be prepared to meet the immediate initial requirements in an emergency. A preliminary survey of these requirements indicates clearly that a substantial increase in personnel over and above that contained in these estimates will be required.

That is what gives me apprehension as to what the national-defense program is going to jump to as a whole if we have to provide for a greatly increased personnel.

I believe the House is very well satisfied with the bill that is before you. We have gone carefully into all the items and have pared them down as much as possible; yet as I say, the thing that gives me pause is what supplementary estimates will be brought to us in the future. I, for one, believe we should keep our Regular Army down to as small proportions as possible. I do not believe we should go so much above what we have now, with the exception of increasing the enlisted and officer personnel of the air force. We must have that increased. But I think we should depend principally upon the National Guard and the Reserve officers, and that we should not in the days to come get the jitters and increase our Regular Army to any undue extent.

Mr. Chairman, the question has been brought up as to whether or not we are justified in providing for the present increase in our air force. I am like Will Rogers; all I know is what I see in the papers. But we see that the nations abroad are increasing their air forces. We hear from travelers from abroad and from technical men and others, and through our Military Intelligence Department, the statement that there have been vast increases in foreign air forces.

England and France certainly must have got some scare thrown into them at Munich to have made them surrender as they did to Herr Hitler at that time. We heard much during the great World War of treaties being made into scraps of paper, yet as fine and great a nation as is England stood by the elbow of France and consented to making a mere scrap of paper of a treaty France had with Czechoslovakia.

I feel on this question of the air force as did a private in a Mississippi regiment during the Civil War. The first platoon of his company was sent up to the front, the second platoon being held in the rear in reserve. This private was in the combat line. After the fighting had progressed for a while, he came rushing back and almost ran over the men in the reserve line. One of them said to him, "John, what are you running for?" He said, "By God, because I can't fly."

So I say that England and France ran at Munich because they did not have enough men to fly. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are considering this afternoon the appropriation bill for the Army for the next year. While I am not here to criticize the subcommittee or the committee on this appropriation bill, I wish to call your attention to the fact that we have increased the appropriation this year to $499,857,000, whereas the bill last year called for $460,201,000, or an increase of approximately $40,000,000. Our appropriation bills are all increasing annually. It should not happen. We should and we must reduce them.

It is not so much the pending War Department appropriation bill I wish to discuss this afternoon as it is all the appropriation bills. Every one should be cut 20 percent below the Budget, and especially those we are dwelling on in preparation for war. Sometimes I believe we have gone a little war mad or have a little hysteria in this country that is creating a lot of unrest between our own Nation and Germany and other foreign countries. If there is ever a time in our history when we want to keep both feet on the ground, it is now. We also must be careful what we do and what we say, because we do not want war with any nation. It was Sherman who said, "War is hell." Also, Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, at Chataqua, N. Y., in 1936 said, "I hate war." So we have now not only the criticism of war by Sherman and the President, but I believe everybody dislikes war. Yet what have we been doing in the past 6 years in preparation for that event? Notwithstanding the fact the President said "I hate war," he sure is preparing for it.

When you prepare for war, as a rule you generally get it. When a man is looking for trouble, if he looks far enough he can get into almost any kind of trouble he wants to. Mr. Roosevelt criticized the preceding administration because of the fact that we would soon have a billion-dollar war bill and the Nation would spend annually a billion dollars for war. What have we been doing since Mr. Roosevelt has been in office? We are spending over two billions annually for war. We passed the famous $4,000,000,000 Vinson naval bill during his administration. We passed the Wilcox bill authorizing a great chain of air fortresses.

Last year we passed the famous naval bill authorizing at one time the expenditure of $1,250,000,000 for naval construction. That bill alone, if we carried it out, would require the building of 400,000 additional tons of warships at a cost of $1,250,000,000, and when we completed that program we would have a navy of 2,000,000 tons. Such a navy would be equal to four times the naval strength of Germany, three times the naval strength of Italy, three times the naval strength of France, and two times the naval strength of Japan, and would be equal to the naval strength of Great Britain. Some war program I would say.

Do you, living in the Western Hemisphere where we should live in peace and happiness and contentment with our neighbors, believe we should have any such program for naval strength? We talk about adequate defense. I am sure I am as much in favor of adequate defense as anyone, but let some one define it; let some one tell us just what is necessary in order that we may have adequate defense for our people. We are preparing for war; we are going way beyond the point of adequate defense—if I know anything about it. Who is responsible? Why, the President and the Congress for doing it. Do not prepare for war or we will get it.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman is speaking of adequate national defense. That is all we hear and have heard around the Halls of Congress during the past several months. I should like to ask the gentleman this question: Does not the gentleman believe that national defense depends entirely on what our foreign policy is?

I would further ask the gentleman this question. Does he have any idea what our foreign policy is, and by the same token does he or anyone else have any idea what our domestic policy may be?

Mr. RICH. I would say to the gentleman that I do not know what our foreign policy is, but I think the Congress should give the matter consideration and come to some conclusion on what that policy should be and not leave it to the other end of the Avenue to define our foreign policy. That is a most dangerous policy.

So far as protection of ourselves is concerned in the matter of adequate defense, I would like to have the Congress define what is essential to our adequate defense. We can and should do it; no, we leave it to the President and to the war generals and admirals and their assistants.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if we would require as much preparedness if we would stay at home and attend to our own business, as we would if we continue the present policy of sticking our nose into everybody else's business?

Mr. RICH. Well, I may tell the gentleman from Minnesota that whenever a man sticks his nose into other people's business, he always gets himself into a lot of trouble. The only thing to do is to keep your nose and fingers out of the other fellow's business. That is sensible and sound business. We have enough to do at home without trying to rule the world.

However, I want to bring you to this point. The greatest and most essential element in any policy of sound, national defense, is having a sound currency and a sound Treasury. [Applause.] The greatest individual item essential to preparedness and essential to our national welfare is a sound balance in the Treasury, but where do we find ourselves today? We find that we are $39,858,000,000 in the red, and $20,000,000,000 of that amount has been created in the last 6 years. Think of it! The amount has more than doubled in the last 6 years and we have not had any war. We have been at war with depression, but instead of getting ourselves in a better position, we have spent 6 years and $20,000,000,000 and we are worse off today than we were 6 years ago, with 12,000,000 people out of employment, when we should have only 10,000,000 out of employment to be where we were 6 years ago; but we should have conquered the depression, had all our people back to work, and have an annual balanced Budget. It could have been accomplished if we had a sound President and a dependable Congress.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon rose.

Mr. RICH. It is a dreadful situation, and, Governor, let me tell you this: If we continue in this way, we will have the greatest Navy in the world, we will have the greatest Army in the world, but if we did not have a cent to operate it, we would be just like a manufacturing establishment with a fine, large building, with all the best and latest machinery and plenty of labor, without one cent to operate it. Then what would happen? The whole thing would not be worth a hoot and you just could not do a thing with it. This is the situation in which we find ourselves with respect to national defense. A big army, a big navy, and lots of men and no money to operate it. A broken-down New Deal Treasury.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Oh, it is a dreadful situation, a very disappointing position to be in, and I ask you where are you going to get the money to operate the Army and the Navy? [Laughter and applause.]

I now yield to the former Governor of Oregon for the purpose of telling us where we are going to get the money to operate the Government in time of war, if we find ourselves in that position.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. What about our vast supply of gold and silver, amounting to nearly $20,000,000,000?

Mr. RICH. I am glad the gentleman brought that up. We have in the Treasury, as of February 28, in gold, $14,874,317,055.51, over one-half of the world's gold supply.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Two-thirds of it.

Mr. RICH. Yes; thank you for correcting me.

What did we do with it? The President took it down to Kentucky and buried it in a hole in the ground. You have heard about the man who had a talent and buried it, and you recall what happened to his talent. He lost everything, and it did not amount to anything. Now, when we do that with three-quarters of the world's supply of gold, is it not a horrible situation in which we find ourselves? We have taken this gold from the American people, from the banks of the country, and we have buried it in a hole in the ground. That is what ought to happen to this New Deal administration. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I have been present during all the hearings and debates connected with the Bonneville project on the Columbia River, and it appears to me, from my knowledge of the power business, that some vital points have not as yet been covered. I wish to call attention to some facts of vital importance which appear to have been passed over without sufficient emphasis.

We have heard stressed in the last several weeks the country's need for adequate defense. Modernized methods of defense are primarily based on supply of wartime essentials, and such supply is dependent largely on power facilities. I desire to discuss the relation of power production to the defense program in general, and to demonstrate that the Pacific Northwest definitely faces a power shortage.

The development of modern production methods has sharply inclined toward electrochemical processes. These processes are so dependent on abundant power that it can safely be said that power has become the indispensable base of wartime supply. This statement does not apply to any one group of necessary materials, but covers the entire field of such production.

POWER SHORTAGE DURING WORLD WAR

From 1914 to 1918 the output of all the country's generating stations increased 78 percent. It would have doubled had it not been for the shortage of water power during the extreme winter of 1917-18 and the dry spring and summer of 1918. The purchases of the Allies before our entry into the World War had speeded up the production of power, but the early strains of our own program soon brought out the existing shortage of generating capacity. This capacity shortage occurred simultaneously with the freeze up of the winter of 1917, the break-down of transportation, the dry summer of 1918, and the fuel shortage. In the latter part of 1917 this power shortage became acute in the major eastern producing centers, at Niagara and along the Pacific coast. It was this latter shortage that resulted in the early suggestion for the development on the Columbia at the time the Muscle Shoals installation was proposed.

This power shortage was extremely acute in the Niagara Falls district, a region of abundant but neglected potential power. At Niagara, the proprietary interests were more concerned with monopoly than in the efficient development of this vast source of potential power. These interlocked interests depended on the importation of Canadian current, rather than the efficient development of the power sources on the American side. The pressure of Canadian wartime industrial requirements resulted in the forced curtailment of the Niagara-Canadian export power. With the curtailment of this power, the Niagara district, with its concentration of electrochemical plants, presented an acute problem.

A fuel shortage, together with a capacity shortage, forced a national betterment program. The first step in this program was the shutting down of old, inefficient steam plants and interconnection of the available water-power plants through transmission lines. This betterment program did not produce any material results. The problem became so critical that the House of the Sixty-fifth Congress passed H. R. 12776, giving the Federal Government wide powers for the construction, operation, requisition, and purchase of power plants and transmission lines. This bill, which passed the House, carried an appropriation of $200,000,000. The armistice was signed before the bill had gone through the Senate.

The construction of power plants and interconnections require relatively long periods of time. This fact, together with the experience of 1917-18, should warn us as a nation of the hazards incidental to maintaining inadequate power reserves. Water-power plants are a vital part in any program of defense. Such plants relieve the wartime strain on mining and transportation. This is more especially true in those regions such as the Pacific Northwest not blessed with such native fuels as coal and oil. The national power survey shows that, at the time, no coal was burned in fuel-generating stations in the Pacific Northwest. I am working on a comparative study of Niagara and Bonneville, which I shall present in the near future. I intend to point out therein the necessity of avoiding at Bonneville certain operating conditions which would prevent the fullest realization of the conceptions of the Bonneville Act.

DISTRIBUTION OF DEFENSE SUPPLY

Before the days of the modern airship it was the custom to concentrate the Nation's supply and gun factories in comparatively narrow areas. Such a concentration plan makes these supply sources vulnerable to modern air attacks. Most of the Nation's supply factories are located along the Atlantic seaboard, and in such a narrow area that a small-size fleet of aircraft could put these sources out of commission and reduce this Nation's defense to a helpless condition. Modernized defense supply requires the distribution rather than the concentration of the sources. If the Nation is to have an adequate defense program, the Pacific coast should have its proportion of such supply facilities. If private capital will not consent to distribute these facilities, then the Government, out of necessity, must do so.

The high Cascade Range can be made an aircraft barrier from the west. The distribution of supply factories should be both east and west of the Bonneville Dam, which is just west of the range. Eastern Oregon and eastern Washington, due to their strategic location and close proximity to the water-borne transportation of the Columbia, are ideal locations for distributed supply sources. Bonneville's power transmission lines should therefore extend eastward. The program submitted by the Bonneville administrator this year contemplates such an extension. In the consideration of the Bonneville appropriation bill, which will shortly be before you, I urge that the defense features be accorded their full measure of importance. If neglected, the results will be tantamount to stripping the North Pacific section of all defense.

POWER MARKETS OF PACIFIC NORTHWEST

The point as to the power market has been raised by the opposition both in hearings and in debate. Independent of any national-defense program, I will briefly discuss one angle of this question. Unless we know the condition, adequacy, and efficiency of the existing power supply of the Northwest we are not in a position to say whether its present and future power facilities will meet the national and regional requirements.

SCHEDULE OF CONSTRUCTION AT BONNEVILLE

The dam and powerhouse at Bonneville were built to accommodate ultimately 10 generating units. This ultimate development of 10 units was originally planned to total 432,000 kilowatts. Experience gained in the construction of the dam, powerhouse, and auxiliaries has convinced the Corps of Engineers that the first ultimate estimate can be economically and properly increased to 504,000 kilowatts.

The first section of the powerhouse has been completed. This section includes two generating units and the substructure for four additional units. The superstructure, however, was completed only to the extent of housing the two generating units now installed. These two generating units, which are now in operation, have a capacity of 86,400 kilowatts—a relatively small capacity. The water wheels driving these units are known as the Kaplan type of adjustable-blade propeller wheels. The adjustment of the blades permits the turbines to maintain their top efficiency under a wide variation in head conditions, ranging from about 30 to 70 feet.

The second step in the construction schedule was authorized in Public Act, 591, approved June 11, 1938, and funds for the addition of two units were carried in this War Department civil appropriation bill. This authorization carries with it the completion of the powerhouse superstructure for the four additional units and the immediate installation of two units with all necessary auxiliaries. Shop manufacture of the two additional units has been initiated, but will not be completed until a year hence. Field erection will take another year. Therefore the present authorization for two units which will give a total capacity of 190,000 kilowatts, cannot possibly be completed until the spring of 1941, and it will take at least the balance of that year before the additional capacity will be available to the market. Funds for the additional six units have not yet been appropriated. I understand that it is the War Department's plan to step this construction and erection by units of two. Under such a plan the earliest date for completion of the 10-unit power plant would be the midyear of 1944, with another year for transmission construction. Thus it will be 6 years before this power can be taken to its market, even if, through congressional appropriation, the units are built continuously.

Because of this building schedule, I will confine my discussion to the study of the potential power market in 1945. It will, no doubt, be remembered that I introduced a bill which was largely embodied in the Bonneville legislation which was passed by Congress—Public, 329, Seventy-fifth Congress. In this act the requirement is made that the Federal Government's investment in power facilities must be returned to the Treasury within a reasonable period. This amortization period has been set by the Administrator at 40 years, with interest on the unamortized balance at 3½ percent, which is approximately 1 percent higher than the current average rate of Government interest, including interest being charged private utilities under the R. E. A.

POWER MARKETS

Markets for Bonneville power will arise from the following necessities:

- First. National-defense utilization.
- Second. Power requirements of navigation.
- Third. Growth of load resulting from the lowering of rates.
- Fourth. Deficiency in existing dependable capacity for load growth.
- Fifth. Rural service.
- Sixth. Industrial service.
- Seventh. Irrigation load.
- Eighth. Processes for betterment of agricultural conditions.
- Ninth. Age retirement of existing private-plant capacity.

Practically all the previous discussion on Bonneville power market has been confined to items 3, 4, and 5, because the points raised in discussions have been limited to this field. I have covered these points fully during the past three sessions. In doing so I realized at the time that the whole field had not been covered. Incorrect impressions can arise if the extent of the market is not fully discussed. As a result of such impressions, it has been stated by the representatives of the private power companies that a market for Bonneville ca-capacity does not exist, and that it will displace present investments. This is not the fact.

PRESENT CAPACITY OBSOLETE

For the last 9 years there has been practically no additional power capacity constructed in the Northwest. A substantial part of the present capacity is old, inadequate, and inefficient. By the time the Bonneville plant can be completed a sizable part of the present existing capacity will have to be retired, due to age, obsolescence, and inadequacy. In order that the pressing need for Bonneville project may be fully realized, I will set out and define the age, efficiency, and inadequacy of the existing power facilities of the Pacific Northwest. My study is based on official facts and figures.

In 1934 the Federal Power Commission investigated this situation throughout the country and sent questionnaires to the private power companies covering age and condition of existing installations. Factual information gathered by the Power Commission from these operating companies and published in their pioneer effort, entitled "National Power Survey," should be read by every Member of Congress. This survey constitutes the first appraisal of the efficiency of American generating plants. It can easily be brought down to date from the current operating figures released by the Power Commission. The National Resources Committee has just completed its report on the energy resources of the Nation. This is in process of being printed, and I have not as yet had an opportunity to study it.

INSTALLED CAPACITY

The installed utility generating capacity in the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho is given in the following table:

TABLE 1

Year	Kilowatts of hydro	Kilowatts of steam	Total all kinds
1920	442,740	148,671	591,571
1929	910,731	272,025	1,184,216
1934	1,111,294	363,100	1,428,118
1937	1,222,039	389,580	1,616,563

This information was taken from the reports of the United States Geological Survey and the Federal Power Commission. The installed plant capacity given in this table does not indicate that this is available or economic capacity. The capacity that governs is the dependable capacity available to meet the sum of the peak consumer demand plus a floating protective reserve and a reserve to handle load growth increases. For example, the 215 major operating systems in the United States reported that for 1934 they had installed capacity of 31.59 million kilowatts. This capacity was needed to meet a major demand of 23.1 million kilowatts maximum. The difference between this installed capacity and maximum demand represents a ratio of 1.37 to 1. This difference is necessary because of dependable capacity, allowance for the protective reserve, and an allowance for a reserve to take care of load growth. It takes anywhere from 1½ to 2 years to build a steam producing plant and anywhere from 2 years to 5 years to construct a hydro plant.

Installed capacity in run-of-the-river hydros is governed by the economic cost of this capacity and its utilization. Some hydros have been built with an installation around three times the output capacity available during periods of low-flow or minimum-head conditions. No piece of machinery can run 100 percent of the time. It is necessary to take machine units out of service for repairs. A floating reserve is therefore necessary to protect service from break-downs. All of these contingencies have to be considered in any calculation, and the capacity available to meet critical periods determines the dependable output capacity.

AGE OF PLANT INSTALLATIONS

The Federal Power Commission, in its National Power Survey of 1934, has tabulated the age of both steam and generating plant capacities in the Pacific Northwest. I present this information in table 2, as an index to the dependable capacity available to meet the critical system peaks.

TABLE 2

Date of installation	Hydro		Steam
	Kilowatts	Percent	Kilowatts	Percent
Prior to 1901.....	6,000	0.5	800	0.2
1901 to 1905.....	24,980	2.3	15,500	4.2
1906 to 1910.....	109,225	10.2	26,000	7.1
1911 to 1915.....	179,963	16.8	32,500	8.9
1916 to 1920.....	86,200	8.1	85,000	23.0
1921 to 1925.....	253,330	23.8	169,000	46.0
1926 to 1930.....	239,130	22.4	35,000	9.6
1931 to 1934.....	137,700	12.9	3,700	1.0
Year not given.....	31,678	3.0
Total.....	1,068,206	100.0	367,500	100.0
Nondependable in 1934, Federal Power Commission.....	232,000	21.7	22,000	6.0
Estimated nondependable, 1945.....	325,000
Total, nondependable, 1945.....	400,000

This is a most striking fact—that 400,000 kilowatts, or 80 percent of the ultimate 1945 power capacity of Bonneville will have disappeared from the dependable classification of other existing systems before Bonneville is completed.

HYDRO CAPACITY

Seventy-six percent of the installed generating capacity of the Pacific Northwest is in hydro installations. Most of the hydro installed capacity in this section is located on the smaller streams. This situation arose from the early consideration of first cost.

These smaller streams have widely varying flow characteristics, and the critical periods for these plants occur in the months of November and December because of low stream flows. These are also the months of maximum consumer demand. During these months, the Bonneville plant will be running at its maximum load, as this plant has been so sized as not to be curtailed by low flows. Low flows, for example, in the smaller streams of Oregon, cause Oregon hydros in dry years, to lose 46 percent of their installed capacity.

In 1934 the Federal Power Commission found 232,000 kilowatts of nondependable hydro capacity in the Northwest out of 1,068,206 kilowatts of installed capacity surveyed. The nondependable capacity represented 21.7 percent of the total. The lack of availability is due to low flows, reduced loads, units down for repairs, lack of storage, and age of the units. This 1934 value of regional dependable capacity is the summation of figures reported by the operating organizations to the Commission. It is obvious that age alone is not the sole determining factor in plant retirement but it furnishes a reliable index.

Applying this 1934 percentage to 1937 installed capacity, we find that the present nondependable hydro capacity is 265,000 kilowatts. By 1945, age will have removed from the dependable category about one-third of that capacity installed between the years 1911 and 1915, or an additional installed capacity of 60,000 kilowatts. By this reasoning it is found that the estimated undependable hydro capacity in 1945 will amount to about 325,000 kilowatts.

STEAM CAPACITY

Twenty-four percent of the total installed generating plant capacity in the Pacific Northwest is represented by fuel-burning stations. No coal is burned in these plants. The fuel used is either oil or lumber refuse. The steam installed capacity in this region is practically all auxiliary or standby service used to back up the water-power plants during low flows. The power survey shows that these plants manufacture normally about 5 percent of the energy produced in the three States, though they have 24 percent of the installed capacity.

The modern supersteam station takes between 12,000 to 13,000 fuel heat units to manufacture a kilowatt. Steam stations carrying any considerable load must have a fuel efficiency from 13 to 18 thousand such units. At the time of the national survey, only 70,000 kilowatts of such capacity existed in the Northwest. This is an insignificant proportion. The typical modern steam station built previous to 1922 is classed as inefficient under modern conditions. By a generally accepted rule the economic life of steam-power equipment is considered to be 20 years. By 1945, according to this rule, 159,000 kilowatts of steam capacity should be retired because of age. Steam plants, having a fuel consumption in excess of 25,000 heat units, are not now being used to carry any base load, but are used only for standby. One hundred and two thousand kilowatts of installed steam capacity in the Northwest have consumption values greater than the critical allowance. Such capacity is classed as inefficient. It is evident from these figures that less than one-third of the existing 24 percent of steam capacity in the Northwest is capable of being economically used for even a small amount of steady load. One hundred and two thousand kilowatts of existing steam capacity out of the total of 367,500 kilowatts cannot be counted on for use in picking up the underlying load increase. Because of age and inefficiency, around 150,000 kilowatts of existing steam capacity should be retired by 1945, but for the purposes of a conservative estimate, I have taken half of this figure as the least retirement capacity for 1945.

SPARE CAPACITY AND RESERVE

Spare capacity that can be immediately available must be held ready to be placed into service to prevent interruptions and to insure adequate service. Units break down and machines have to be taken off the line for overhauling. This contingency, with accidents, requires available spare capacity which is often referred to as a floating reserve.

The amount of this floating reserve varies with the section and the importance of the load. The New York City private companies maintain a floating reserve of 26 to 42 percent. Even with this high reserve percentage, the few stations of the New York company could easily be put out of commission. Several years ago New York City realized what a power shortage meant when the Hell Gate Station had its service disrupted from a minor initial accident. The companies of the Pacific Northwest reported a floating reserve of 14.3 percent of the dependable capacity.

This is a low percentage but can be accepted as a fairly reasonable one because of the preponderance of hydropower. Various authorities have estimated that a floating reserve of 20 to 33 percent is required. The major private power companies have invested their dollars to provide a leeway of 37 percent between installed capacity and demand. They would not have done this unless such a reserve was vitally needed. The experience of the World War demonstrated that such an over-all reserve was completely inadequate during 1917-18.

In addition to a floating reserve, additional reserves are needed to take care of normal load growth and for national defense. The load growth reserve is necessary because of the time element required in plant construction. A minimum load growth reserve of 10 percent is usually taken as an estimating figure, but this is low, as it only represents about 1 year normal growth in load. Plants cannot be projected and built in such a short period.

As I have previously pointed out, the World War experience produced a 78-percent increase in electric consumption. Under more modern conditions this figure will build up to at least 100 percent. This does not mean that after deducting the floating and normal load-growth reserve of, say, 25 percent that an additional 75 percent defense reserve is required. As a wartime measure, power requirements can be rationed and staggered. An initial defense reserve of 20 percent in hydro regions is a minimum reasonable protective defense measure. Such a percentage would not become a burden to the home and farm ratepayer. Fortunately, the Federal plants like T. V. A. and Bonneville can be used to meet such defense emergencies. The protection of the investing public requires that the private companies should amortize and retire obsolete generating capacity. A steam plant not in use deteriorates rapidly, and a nonused steam reserve would be ineffective when necessity demands that such reserve be placed into service.

DEFICIT OF CAPACITY DUE TO SPECULATION

From 1930 to 1938 only 291,000 kilowatts of additional generating capacity have been installed in the Northwest by public and private plants. This is exclusive of the 86,400 now completed at Bonneville. This 8-year installed figure represents 18 percent of the existing installed capacity, a ridiculously small increase for an 8-year period. Of this increase 120,000 kilowatts is represented by the Diablo plant of Seattle's public power system. Therefore, we see that there has been only an increase of 171,000 kilowatts installed in the Northwest during the past 8 years by all interests. Assuming that this increase was all private, we find only a 10½-percent total increase in this 8-year period. Before the depression, covering the boom period from 1920 to 1929, private interests installed an additional capacity each year at an average yearly rate of 11.7 percent. No wonder there is a capacity shortage in this section.

The banks have been overflowing with money and funds could easily be secured for additional capacity if the private power interests were so inclined. The fundamental reason why they have not, results from the passage of remedial legislation tending to prevent manipulation by holding companies. My observation has been that the private utilities were more interested in profits from security juggling than they were in plant operation and construction. Electric-power extension has been governed by speculative motives.

PRODUCTION INCREASES

In 1920, 2,200 million kilowatt-hours were produced in these three States. This production figure rose to 4,600 million kilowatt-hours in 1930 and dropped to 3,970 million at the depth of the depression, in 1933. In 1934, the year of the national power survey, this production had risen to 4,350 million kilowatt-hours. At the end of 1937 the production had risen to 6,000 million kilowatt-hours. Therefore from 1934 to 1938 power production increased 38 percent, with practically no additional capacity being added. Experience from 1934 to 1937 in this region represents a doubling rate of 5½ to 6½ years. Eugene, Oreg., with very much lower rates, has been doubling its output about every 4 years. This increase is principally due to increased residential and farm consumption.

DEMAND INCREASE

Demand figures are not given in the official statistical power releases. However, the 1934 estimated section demand as given by the power survey was 1,066,000 kilowatts. By taking a low estimate of 19 percent for a demand increase under a 38-percent consumption increase, the present expected demand will be around 1,270,000 kilowatts. A 14.3-percent floating reserve requirement will raise the active machine requirements in the Northwest to 1,450,000 kilowatts. Out of the installed capacity of 1,617,000 kilowatts, 297,000 kilowatts is nondependable. This leaves a dependable supply of 1,320,000 kilowatts to meet an active machine requirement of 1,450,000 kilowatts.

The normal present peacetime resumption will find this section with a capacity shortage of 130,000 kilowatts. This estimate which I present does not allow for any low-growth increase as I have considered that the Bonneville plant would take care of such increase. In 1934 the Power Commission estimated the regional shortage to be 100,000 kilowatts—half being in the Puget Sound area and half in south Washington and northern Oregon. Practically all the shortage is in a region contiguous to the Bonneville plant. The normal load increase per year will average about 50,000 kilowatts.

RESERVE CAPACITY

This shortage has been met by operating on a floating reserve. Such a condition cannot be continued, and this necessity is shown by the press reports, stating that the private companies have applied for Bonneville power and some 12,000 kilowatts are being used by such companies even before any transmission lines are built.

The sum of the floating and load-growth reserve in this section amounts to around 25 percent of the peak load. Full wartime production cannot be geared up immediately and, therefore, it seems reasonable that an additional defense reserve of 20 percent in a preponderant hydro section, together with a rationing program for other users, will take care of the initial period of the defense supply program. During such an initial period machines could be installed in those projects with completed dams.

The Columbia Basin has 41 percent of the available potential water power in the United States. This additional defense power reserve in the Northwest should be, at the very minimum, 250,000 kilowatts, or half the ultimate capacity of the Bonneville plant.

The proposal of a 20-percent reserve in connection with the temporary use of the other two reserves, floating and load growth, account for approximately half of the increase encountered during the World War period when there was a definite and crippling shortage.

Hydro power is the ideal reserve, as such a plant equipment does not deteriorate from nonuse like equipment in a steam plant. Hydro costs under partial loads are much less than those of a steam plant. A hydro plant can be placed in service immediately in case of an emergency whereas a steam plant takes considerable time to fire up and warm the turbines so that it will be safe to operate.

Washington, D. C., receives a trifle under one-third of its power consumption from the transmission lines originating at the Susquehanna hydro plants. This Susquehanna power is delivered in Washington for about 2.1 mills per kilowatt-hour net. The most modern steam plant, as represented by one of the plants here in Washington with $4.34 coal, delivers current costing double the Susquehanna delivered cost.

CHEAP POWER AN ASSET

Electrochemical processes require current costing 3 mills or less to produce economically. Bonneville's current, for such use under the established rates, will cost around 2 mills per kilowatt-hour.

I have pending an important bill (H. R. 196) providing for Government construction and operation of a chemical plant to manufacture sodium chlorate at Bonneville. This plant is necessitated by the ravages of noxious weeds which are rapidly destroying farm values. It would be most valuable for the defense of our country in case of war.

PRIVATE UTILITY DEBT STRUCTURE

The statement of these incontrovertible facts very naturally brings to mind the situation of the investors in private utility resources. How will they come out? I have many times pointed out that their investments have been rendered hazardous because of manipulation by utility holding companies with their policy of maintaining permanent debt structures and making no efforts toward paying off the debt load. Faced with inevitable deterioration, investors can protect themselves only by unitedly insisting that company managements amortize debt for equipment which must be retired.

SUMMARY OF POWER NEEDS OF PACIFIC NORTHWEST

To realize the effect of plant obsolescence and inadequacy in the Pacific Northwest in connection with power markets, it is well to summarize the points developed.

First. Bonneville's present capacity is only 86,400 kilowatts.

Second. The capacity available at the beginning of 1942 will be 190,000 kilowatts.

Third. The earliest scheduled date for the ultimate completion will be 1945.

Fourth. By 1945 there will be 400,000 kilowatts of nondependable installed capacity in existing systems of the Pacific Northwest, with about 50 percent in the Bonneville territory.

Fifth. Normal peacetime load increase, by 1945, in Bonneville area, will total 250,000 kilowatts to 300,000 kilowatts.

Sixth. Irrespective of irrigation pumping needs, major industrial load, agricultural betterment loads, and defense reserve, conditions now exist to absorb all of Bonneville's power capacity by the time it can be completed, under a peacetime normal growth schedule.

Seventh. A national defense reserve of 250,000 kilowatts will be needed.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES].

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this supply bill for the fiscal year 1940, your Subcommittee on Appropriations handling this particular phase of the Budget for the year has endeavored to present to you a well-rounded program with a proper balance of personnel and matériel.

The bill provides in the form of personnel for the Regular Army 13,031 officers and 165,000 enlisted men; for the National Guard, 210,000 officers and men; and for the Reserve Corps, approximately 100,000 officers.

What is an adequate national defense? This question is often asked. An adequate national defense is a defense adequate to take care of this country and its people any time, anywhere, having in view the state of affairs existing throughout the world and taking into consideration our position as a world power among the sister nations of the earth, our wealth, our commerce, our people and their relations to other people.

We shall also have to take into account at any given time the amount of money that other nations expend for national defense and the care and the condition of their armed forces.

It is a changing term. There is nothing fixed about it. It cannot be fixed unless you can fix or freeze world conditions. If you can do that, if you can strait jacket the earth and know for a certainty, year after year and generation after generation what the wealth and the power of nations are to be, then we will know whether or not we are adequately prepared.

I am not at all alarmed because we have had to make some changes during the past 12 or 18 months in meeting world conditions. I think that is a tribute rather than otherwise to the men in the Army and Navy whom we have charged with the responsibility of keeping us advised about conditions. No one could foresee in the whole world, let alone in the United States, what would take place in Europe last year. I can assure you England, France, and other European nations were much more shocked at the revelations at Munich than was the United States.

There is one phase of our national defense to which I want to direct your attention at this time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is it not true that one thing stands out—that lack of preparation was a very contributing factor to what did occur there?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Absolutely. There is no question about that; and England and those nations who were reminded at that hour have taken unprecedented action during the past 6 or 8 months in order to remedy the conditions which they found existing at that time.

I think the $499,000,000 which we are appropriating here for our own national-defense needs is a modest sum when you take into consideration the fact that this year England is expending $2,510,407,800 for her national-defense budget.

One thing to which I wish to call attention at this time as being of vital importance to us is the preparation of industry for wartime needs. This preparation is the principal key-stone of our modern national-defense policy. The Army has wisely taken cognizance of our lack of industrial preparation and has urged upon the Congress, and the Congress has adopted a national policy pursuant to their recommendation for bringing about proper coordination of industry and the Army to supply the Army for its needs in an emergency. That was provided for in legislation which was passed last year, setting up a system of educational orders. The system or policy of "educational orders" is merely a cooperative means of bringing together the Army's industrial planning officers and industry's production men so that their common problems may be best attacked. These orders can be given only on what we term critical items. We have 55 of those so-called critical items. The following qualifications must be met:

First, those items must be essential.

Second, they must be standard.

Third, they must be noncommercial.

Fourth, they must be required in mass quantities in wartime.

Fifth, it must be shown that mass production could not be attained in 6 months by any other method.

In pursuance of that policy we appropriated $2,000,000 last year, and the program is now under way. Two million dollars will be provided for in this bill, as authorized under the act of 1938.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. As I understand, if these orders are not given to business, many of the workmen will be so out of practice that they will be untrained at a time when we will need them?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Unquestionably. It is for the purpose of providing trained personnel as well as giving industry some encouragement to change their plants so that they can be transformed from peacetime to wartime production overnight.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am delighted. I introduced a bill providing for the first educational orders bill away back in 1926.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. I am pleased at the lady's interest in the subject.

The five things that can come from this educational program, the objectives which the War Department hopes to obtain are—

First, the testing of the specifications;

Second, development of mass-production designs;

Third, conduct of the production study, showing the methods used;

Fourth, creation of dies, gages, jigs, tools, and other necessary implements peculiar to the article;

And finally, the manufacture of sufficient numbers to test this method.

The War Department has already received bids on six of these items which were given priority. Those bids were for gas masks, recoil mechanism for the 3-inch antiaircraft guns, searchlights, forgings for 75-millimeter shells, machining 75-millimeter shells, and for semiautomatic rifles.

Pursuing further this thought, I call to your attention this fact: Of the five munitions plants we have owned and operated by the Government, four are located north and east of Philadelphia. The other plant is located at Rock Island. In all this vast expanse of territory which we call the United States, these are the only munition plants which the Army has. All except the Rock Island plant are located in comparatively vulnerable areas. We need decentralization of industry in this country, and we need decentralization of munition plants for the manufacture of essential items for our national defense. [Applause.] These plants should be located away from the seacoast, and we should construct plants away from the seacoast, behind the mountains, where they will be close to the source of raw material and an available labor supply, with a transportation net available, and where they will be practically invulnerable from attack. This applies particularly to the manufacture of chemical warfare ingredients as well as to munitions.

We have all of our eggs in one basket insofar as this one particular arm of the service is concerned, and there is pressing and vital need for the construction of an additional chemical warfare plant in this country at the present hour.

It takes too long to make proper industrial plans and adjustments to wartime needs for us to delay action in this matter until we are threatened with an emergency. We learned this lesson in the last war in which we engaged. We did not fly a single American plane over the front line. We borrowed our artillery from the British and the French, and at one time we had to borrow rifles and machine guns from the British and the French during the great conflict.

This one subject—the preparation of industry, the keystone of our modern national-defense policy—in my judgment, is the outstanding need of the hour, and the one to which we must first direct our attention. We can get the personnel in abundance. Our supply of manpower is practically inexhaustible; and while our raw material in most of the critical items is also practically inexhaustible, we do not have adequate facilities for the preparation of the items so essential to our national defense.

What I said with reference to munitions in the Chemical Warfare Service applies to our manufacture of planes. Sixty percent of the plane industry today is located along the Pacific coast in the Los Angeles and Seattle areas.

Decentralization, in my judgment, is the answer. The construction of additional munitions plants in other sections of the country, one in the Southeast, one in these mountains out here to the west of us in West Virginia and Pennsylvania, one along the Great Lakes area, and the development of that magnificent new plant we have at Ogden, Utah, would fill the bill admirably in this respect.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I am very much interested in the suggestion made for the decentralization of our munitions plants. About 2 years ago I took up with the Chief of Staff of the Army the thought of locating such a plant at Norris, Tenn., where the Government already has a town consisting of a hundred or so fine buildings that are not suitable for ordinary industry because it would cost too much to rent them; but in these munition plants, of course, highly skilled labor is employed, and their operations are of such a nature they could afford to pay the rent necessary for the use of such buildings. The Chief of Staff later reported to me that he had had a survey made and said that he was very much impressed by the suggestion, but I have heard nothing further about it.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. I can assure the gentleman from Tennessee that this matter is being seriously considered by the War Department and is undergoing study at the present time. A resolution has been introduced in the Military Affairs Committee of the House seeking to have a survey conducted immediately with reference to certain points I have raised here in this discussion. The great area to which the gentleman has referred is vitally essential to our national defense system and is admirably suited for the location not only of munitions plants, but of chemical warfare plants as well.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I may say that it was my pleasure during the past summer to make a visit of inspection to numerous Army posts in continental United States, as well as in some of our insular possessions. There are some observations I wish to make with reference to that trip and give you the benefit of my experiences.

There has been remarkable progress in the arming and equipping of our armed forces during the past 5 years. Much remains to be accomplished. At El Paso the Army should acquire additional land for maneuvering purposes. The same can be said in the Monterey area of the great State of California. They have a wonderful site there for training of divisions, or even of an army, which should be taken advantage of.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Much has been said about our air forces. Regardless of the strength of the air forces of other nations, man for man and ship for ship, the United States of America has the best air force in the whole wide world today.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. I am very much interested in seeing the air forces brought up to the authorized strength. What provision is the committee making in reference to bringing it up to present authorization strength?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. The air forces?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. This bill calls for the completion of the Baker Board program, and in addition thereto the construction of 565 additional planes.

Mr. BROOKS. Will that bring it up to the 4,100 authorization?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. No; it brings it up to 2,985 planes, if I recall correctly.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. We never had any 4,100 authorized until this year. The only number authorized has been 2,320.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. That is true; but in view of the recent action of the House, raising the authorization to 5,500 planes, I consider that a moot question.

I found a high esprit de corps among both officers and enlisted men. They are meeting the responsibility thrust upon them and providing for our national defense in a magnificent manner, one in keeping with true American traditions. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, within the next few weeks the Civilian Conservation Corps will complete 6 years of activity as an organization for the conservation of natural resources and unemployed youth. I want to take this occasion to express my deep appreciation for the excellent work which the C. C. C. has done throughout the whole country, and especially in my home State of Washington. I am certain that none of the New Deal agencies has made a finer record for itself than has the C. C. C. An experiment when it started, the corps rapidly placed itself upon a firm foundation, and over the last 5 years it has had the wholehearted approval of the entire country.

THE C. C. C. HAS A RECORD OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

In the approximately 6 years that it has been in operation it has operated an aggregate of more than 4,000 camps and furnished employment to approximately 2,000,000 young men and more than 200,000 war veterans, Indians, and residents of Puerto Rico, Alaska, the Virgin Islands, and Hawaii. The young men who have gone to the C. C. C. camps have had a wonderful experience. In the approximately 9 months which the average boy remains in the C. C. C. he learns how to work, develops physical hardihood, learns something of discipline, and, if he takes advantage of the opportunities offered him, develops skills which improve his chances for obtaining private employment. The C. C. C. records show that thousands of young men who entered the camps without work experience were able to obtain outside jobs within a few months, largely as a result of the training and education obtained in the corps.

IT IS A WHOLESOME LIFE

There is no doubt but that the life of the C. C. C. camps has been a wholesome one for the average young man who has enrolled in the corps. The C. C. C. has also proved a boon to the country, for it has given the Nation its first nationwide, worth-while conservation program. At the time the C. C. C. was initiated America's natural resources of forests and soil were on the downgrade. In a recent statement before the House Labor Committee, Dr. H. H. Bennett, chief of the Soil Conservation Service, stated that over the last 50 years soil resources valued at $20,000,000,000 had been destroyed by erosion. Over the last 6 years the C. C. C. has labored to repair some of the damages caused by past generations of neglect. The records of the C. C. C. show that the men have worked on some 150 different types of jobs, including the planting of trees, forest improvement, the construction of fire towers, laying of telephone lines, building of truck trails, erosion control, flood control, and recreational and wildlife development. I am advised that the national reforestation program has been advanced by the planting of more than 1,500,000,000 forest tree seedlings—more trees than were planted during a whole decade prior to the beginning of the C. C. C. Forest stands have been improved over more than 3,000,000 acres and campaigns to reduce the damages caused by tree diseases and tree-attacking insects have been carried on over more than 17,000,000 acres.

A tremendous amount of work has been done in the field of forest protection. Close to 100,000 miles of truck trails and minor roads have been built. Something like 67,000 miles of telephone lines have been built through forest areas to improve communication systems. More than 3,400 lookout houses and towers have been built in forests and parks for fire-protection purposes. Enrollees have constructed 41,303 bridges and 45,000 other buildings of various sorts. The presence of the enrollees in the woods has furnished the Nation with a fine forest fire-fighting patrol force, which has undoubtedly saved millions of dollars worth of timber. Through its work the C. C. C. has aroused national interest in conservation and awakened the whole country to the need for a continued program for the development and protection of our natural resources.

THE C. C. C. AND THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

The C. C. C. has been of great value to the people of my State. While protection of forests from fire has been one of the major accomplishments of enrollees working out of Washington C. C. C. camps, they have also done much to aid the United States Forest Service, the National Park Service, and other bureaus of the Departments of Interior and Agriculture to advance their work programs. Because of the camps, much has also been accomplished in the way of developing park and forest recreational facilities, aiding in the restoration and conservation of wildlife, control of white-pine blister rust, pine beetles, and the control of harmful soil erosion and other improvement and development work on public lands.

A total of 37 camps are in operation at the present time in the State. Of these, 16 are on national-forest lands. Seven camps are working on privately owned timberlands, and one on State-forest land in Snohomish County. All of the forest camps operate under the direction of the United States Forest Service. Combating soil erosion is carried on by six camps on projects directed by the Soil Conservation Service. Two camps are on reclamation projects under the Bureau of Reclamation; the National Park Service directs the work of four camps; four are on State parks and one on the Mount Rainier National Park.

VARIED FORMS OF FOREST PROTECTION

Forest protection and improvement are the major activities of C. C. C. enrollees within the State. All forest camps engage in activities dealing with forest-fire control; those on National and State forest land, in addition to fire control, operate on improvement and development projects. Camps on private timberland, however, are limited to fire-protection operations carried out under Federal-State private-owner agreements.

There are two general phases of C. C. C. work on forest-fire protection in the State. The first is the provision of manpower for fire fighting in groups strategically located throughout the timbered areas. The Corps has, in many respects, become the first line of fire defense. Since the Corps was started, C. C. C. enrollees have spent a total of 203,000 man-days fighting forest fires in Washington.

The second phase of fire-protection work is, in reality, a form of insurance for the State's forest resources. The camps have constructed 3,650 miles of truck trails and minor roads and many hundreds of miles of new foot and horse trails. Over 2,800 miles of telephone lines have been erected, plus 215 lookout towers and houses and other physical improvements which materially strengthen the detection, communication, and transportation systems in forests and parks, thus resulting in the speedier movement of adequate control forces to the scene of the fires. In all, this type of work has resulted in the saving of millions of dollars' worth of timber which might otherwise have gone up in smoke and flame, not to mention the losses of watershed regulation, recreational possibilities, and the ruination of wildlife habitat.

EMPHASIS IS PLACED ON SAFETY OF ENROLLEES

Because of the importance in the personal safety of enrollees themselves and to enable them to carry on the most effective work possible while engaged in fire fighting, all camps receive chances for fire-fighting training. This is carried out systematically by field officers and technical experts of the Federal and State forestry offices. Lectures and demonstrations are given, coupled with instruction on actual fires, in order to fully train leaders and foremen and to familiarize enrollees with special tools and equipment and the various specialized methods of fire fighting used in the region.

In addition to saving many millions of board feet of timber from fire, the C. C. C. has been credited with being the main bulwark of defense during periods when fires threatened many communities with destruction. In speaking of the relation of the C. C. C. to the State's forest program, C. W. Cowan, chief fire warden of the Washington Forest Fire Association, said in an annual report:

The efforts of the Civilian Conservation Corps have been most successful in fire suppression; it has done a tremendous job in its trail and road work and is, in the main, responsible for the decrease in incendiary fires.

In this State there is the problem of the recreation-seeker fires, as well as the problem of hazard reduction. The corps in its several years of practical experience now brings to its physical efforts an understanding of the problem of whys and hows of what to do. Its effort in road building, as outlined, promises to make the problem of forest protection more effective and is more than a statement of miles built. The location of these roads, covering, as they do, an empire of young and vigorous second growth as well as potential forest lands, is a matter not only of State and National importance; it is a matter of pride in the intelligent and vigorous effort. The number of miles of telephone lines, the lookout towers built, firebreaks constructed, the establishment of a forest nursery—all are details in a complete forest program. Such efforts will, to the greatest extent, repay the Nation.

CONTROL OF INSECT PESTS

In addition to fire protection, C. C. C. enrollees covered many thousands of acres on control measures against pine beetle and white-pine blister rust, destructive insect pest and tree disease. Work against the spread of pine beetles consists of locating infested trees and burning them to prevent spread of the insects to host shrubs. To control white-pine blister rust, C. C. C. crews destroy currant bushes and other plants of the genus Ribes, which act as alternate host to the disease, to block the spread of the disease from tree to bush and again to trees.

Development and improvement activities were other major tasks of the National and State forest and park camps. The construction of forest roads and trails, in addition to strengthening fire-control systems, also aid administration and other uses of the areas. They have made forest resources more easily available and allowed more people to utilize the superb recreational possibilities of Washington's forests and parks. Many new public campgrounds are now available to visitors from Washington and other States. In carrying out improvement of recreational areas, simple bench and table combinations, outdoor stoves and sanitary conveniences, water supplies, and other facilities have been constructed.

REFORESTATION IS ASSISTED

Timber stands were improved for future usage by cultural operations carried on by C. C. C. crews under the guidance of forest technicians over more than 4,700 acres. A total of 17,526,000 trees were planted by C. C. C. enrollees in Washington as part of the Nation-wide reforestation program being carried on by the corps. Under the direction of State foresters C. C. C. enrollees have provided much of the labor for the growing of seedlings used in reforestation operations in a State-owned tree nursery near Olympia and in a Federal nursery in the Wind River Valley.

Camps operating under the direction of the Soil Conservation Service have completed a large amount of work in the demonstration of modern methods of soil erosion control practices. Since the start of the C. C. C. more than 8,400 erosion check dams were built. Thousands of acres of rich agricultural and range lands in the eastern part of the State have benefited from this work. Operations include the control of gully and sheet erosion and the protection of range lands by contour furrows and the digging of diversion ditches.

Some of the accomplishments of the erosion-control program during the past fiscal year alone include the following: The protection of 47,000 square yards of stream and lake bank protection, more than 800,000 square yards of bank sloping completed, and a total of 1,452 check dams of all kinds constructed. More than 440,000 square yards of banks were seeded and sodded.

PRACTICAL EDUCATIONAL TRAINING IS PROVIDED

In addition to the great benefits provided the State, through the work of the corps, those young men from Washington who have enrolled in the C. C. C., and the enrollees of other States in the camps in Washington, have received valuable training which will greatly influence their future lives. Enrollees of all camps joined in training classes and groups which made use of the work being actually accomplished in the field to learn work techniques and become familiar with various tools and equipment. The Washington camps have furnished many private concerns and Federal and State organizations with truck drivers and operators of road and heavy machinery, young men who have had preliminary experience in various types of woods work, clerical help, and employees in other fields due to C. C. C. training.

During the first 5 years of the C. C. C. the program provided 44,405 Washington men with employment, a figure which includes more than 38,000 enrollees, as well as Reserve officers, work supervisors, and others. Total C. C. C. obligations during the same period in Washington were estimated at close to $50,000,000.

Before concluding, I want to say that I have been profoundly impressed by the tremendous amount of sound and worth-while work which the young men and the war veterans of the corps have been able to accomplish throughout the country over the last 5 years. I am also greatly impressed by the fine record which the corps has made in the development of young men. Entering the C. C. C. camps as green, awkward, skinny boys, they go out as young men with bodies filled out, shoulders thrown back, and heads held high. Their spirits, their self-respect, and morale have been improved. They return to their homes with faces aglow, with confidence to tackle any job. I am confident that Congress will act promptly to insure that the fine work which the C. C. C. is doing will be continued. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4630, the War Department appropriation bill, 1940, had come to no resolution thereon.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION BILL

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4425) to provide for reorganizing agencies of the Government, and for other purposes, the time for general debate be limited to not to exceed 8 hours, to be confined to the bill and be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4630, the War Department appropriation bill, 1940.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4630, the War Department appropriation bill, 1940, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle assigned for the exclusive use of persons other than the Secretary of War and medical officers on out-patient medical service.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 11 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER]?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but we cannot go back, under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER] object?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. According to my understanding, an agreement was reached this morning that general debate would last for 2 hours. I came into the Hall at 12 minutes past 2, which would be less than 2 hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The agreement reached in the House was that general debate should not exceed 2 hours.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4630, the War Department appropriation bill, 1940, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, this is the eve of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the First Congress of the United States under the Constitution. May I take this occasion to congratulate the House and to thank my committee and my colleagues for their splendid cooperation in passing the first Army appropriation bill in 150 years without even an amendment being offered.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be postponed from tomorrow until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter which I received from the Governor of New York, the Honorable Herbert H. Lehman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech made by a colleague of mine on national defense last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from Frank C. Balfour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 4630) just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. KITCHENS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution passed yesterday by the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Commission in reference to the death of the late John J. Boylan, of New York; also a brief statement by Joseph P. Tumulty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DALY (at the request of Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania), indefinitely, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, March 4, 1939, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1939

(Legislative day of Monday, February 27, 1939)

The Senate met at 11:30 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in whose keeping are the destinies of men and nations, incline Thine ear and hearken unto our prayer on behalf of the people of these United States, that we may prove ourselves ever mindful of Thy favor and glad to do Thy will. Save us from violence, discord, and confusions, from pride and arrogance, and from every evil way. Grant to us dignity in our own eyes by taking us into Thy service, humble us by laying bare before us our littleness and our sin, and then exalt us by revealing Thyself to us as our Counselor, our Father, and our Friend.

Bestow upon the Members of the Congress Thy special blessing, open their eyes to receive new light, open their ears that they may hear the voices that are calling for a world made new by the power of love, and do Thou send them forth this day as springs of strength and concord to this people whom they have pledged themselves to serve. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT, AND AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACTS—PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting suggested amendments to the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act and the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Colorado, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate Joint Memorial 11

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States, legislation which will provide for the taxing of the incomes of employees of all State, county, city, school district, and other political subdivisions of the States by the Federal Government; and

Whereas said legislation also provides for the taxing of incomes of all Federal employees, within the jurisdiction of the several States, by the States; and

Whereas it is to the best interests of the people of the State of Colorado that said measures be enacted into law: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Thirty-second General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the house of representatives concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States is hereby urged to enact into law measures providing for the reciprocal taxation of the incomes of State and Federal employees by the States and the Federal Government; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and the Senators and Representatives from the State of Colorado in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BYRNES presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent resolution requesting Congress of the United States to make provision for the repayment to farmers of taxes paid by them for exemption certificates into Government-sponsored pools

Whereas the last session of the Congress of the United States passed suitable legislation and appropriation to repay the cotton and tobacco farmers of the South the taxes actually paid by them to the Internal Revenue Department for tax-exemption certificates under the Bankhead Cotton Control Act and the Kerr-Smith Tobacco Control Act;

Whereas many of the farmers of the South purchased from the local county agents, as operator of a Government-sponsored cotton-exemption certificate pool and/or a tobacco-exemption certificate pool, the necessary certificates to gin and/or sell their cotton and tobacco; and

Whereas the farmers of the South are justly entitled to be repaid for all moneys spent for said exemption certificates from Government-sponsored pools and to deny them such refund is contrary to common justice in view of the fact that said farmers were urged by the Government to purchase said certificates from said pools: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully urged and requested to provide at the seventy-sixth session now convened the necessary appropriation and act to refund all money paid by cotton and tobacco farmers for the purchase of all certificates under the regulations of the Bankhead cotton-control bill and the Kerr-Smith tobacco-control bill, whether the same was paid direct to the Internal Revenue Department or to Government-sponsored pools; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed by the clerk of the Senate of South Carolina to each of the Senators from South Carolina, to each of the Members of the House of Representatives from South Carolina, and a copy to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America.

GREETINGS TO THE CONGRESS FROM GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, an interesting and historical event took place this morning in the office of the Speaker of the House of Representatives in connection with the ceremony commemorating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the first session of the Congress of the United States.

In the presence of the Vice President, the Honorable JOHN N. GARNER, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, greetings were extended by the president, the directors, the faculty, and the students of Georgetown University to the Congress of the United States assembled in Washington March 4, 1939, to commemorate the first session of the Federal Congress held in New York on March 4, 1789.

The special appropriateness of Georgetown University extending greetings is set forth in the scroll containing the greetings, as follows:

1789—COLLEGIUM GEORGIOPOLITANUM—1939

The president, the directors, the faculty, and students of Georgetown University

To the Congress of the United States, assembled in Washington, March 4, 1939, to commemorate the first session of the Federal Congress, held in New York on March 4, 1789—

Greetings in the Lord:

Mindful of the historic event commemorated on this day, and mindful of the fact that in the year 1789 Georgetown College was founded, thus beginning its service to the Nation simultaneously with the Congress of the United States, then assembled for the first time under the newly adopted Constitution, we desire to express herewith our felicitations to the two branches of the National Legislature, together with our heart-felt prayer that the two institutions, born in the same year, may long continue their mutual respect and unbroken cooperation in the service of God and country.

Mindful, too, that the Thirteenth Congress of the United States, on motion of the first student enrolled in Georgetown College after its foundation—the illustrious William Gaston, later Representative from North Carolina—did, in 1815, grant a charter for educational purposes to the same college, we extend to the successors of the said Thirteenth Congress our gratitude and appreciation for the continued safeguard of the inalienable rights guaranteed by our organic law and do hereby pledge ourselves anew to the defense of the civil and religious liberties enumerated in that document, under which both the Nation and the university have subsisted for the past 150 years.

[Seal containing the words: "President and directors of Georgetown College, District of Columbia."]

Arthur A. O'Leary, S. J., president; Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., chancellor; John E. Grattan, dean of the college; Wilfrid Parsons, S. J., dean, graduate school; David McCauley, S. J., dean, medical school; George E. Hamilton, dean, law school; Joseph L. B. Murray, dean, dental school; Thomas H. Healy, dean, school of foreign service; Thomas J. Gildea, Thomas A. Dwyer, Marlin S. Reichley, Francis McAdams, Edward A. Salloom, James R. O'Connell, for the student body.

SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIRST INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, today we observe the sixth anniversary of the first inauguration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. During that period the Chief Executive has faced an unprecedented series of trials at home and perils abroad. I should like to review briefly the problems which he has faced and the courageous and statesmanlike manner in which he has moved to meet them.

President Roosevelt assumed office at the peak of an acute financial and industrial crisis. Business was prostrate; agriculture was crushed under the weight of ruinous prices and glutted markets; millions of worthy citizens were out of employment, their meager savings washed away in bank failures and their homes threatened by foreclosure. The so-called leaders of the day were terrified into inaction, doing nothing while they whispered behind drawn curtains that democracy was on trial and might flounder in the general catastrophe.

Substituting confidence for caution and courage for timidity, President Roosevelt rode out the storm by brilliant and decisive leadership. He conquered the depression and restored economic progress. Over the angry protests of the defeatists, who suddenly became vocal when conditions improved, President Roosevelt pushed through to enactment a constructive program of reforms designed to wipe out for all time the wrongs and abuses that brought on the depression. The Nation has given its wholehearted endorsement to these splendid reforms, and no political party will ever dare propose their repeal.

Bank depositors are now insured against loss. The Social Security Act has given a new hope in life to those who must face old age without financial independence. The wholesale swindling of honest investors has been curbed by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Food, clothing, and shelter have been provided for the needy. Labor has been given the right to collective bargaining and a way has been provided to settle disputes between employer and employee without resort to industrial anarchy. The C. C. C. camps have given hundreds of thousands of young men a new start in life, both in health and occupation. The farmers have been given abundant Federal assistance to help them obtain a fair return for their labor. Business has been stimulated by generous loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Federal funds have been wisely expended to provide good schools, improved highways, and modern public buildings. The faith of the people in the integrity of their Government has been renewed.

In the field of foreign affairs the Roosevelt administration has acted with equal wisdom and foresight. The good-neighbor policy has been substituted for dollar diplomacy to improve our relations with the nations of Latin America. The Chief Executive has kept the peace and avoided entanglement in the vexatious controversies arising from the frightful war in Spain, the conflict in the Orient, and the recurring crises which threatened to involve the whole of Europe in armed combat. He has insured the United States against attack and won the respect of the world by the prudent policy of reconstructing the national armament.

We have come through this period vigorous and unafraid, untroubled by the menacing problems that confront less fortunate nations. We have preserved and vindicated democracy, retaining intact our God-given liberties of freedom of speech, freedom of worship, and freedom of the press. Reform has been accomplished and a firm foundation has been established for a new and more permanent prosperity in which not only a favored few but all citizens shall justly participate.

We are a God-fearing and God-worshipping people and realize that the supplications for guidance have been answered.

Mr. President, I am happy to felicitate the Chief Executive, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, on his 6 years of worth-while accomplishment for the general well-being and to reaffirm my faith in the kind of genuine democracy that made such leadership possible.

DEFICIENCY JUDGMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH REAL-ESTATE LOANS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, Senate Resolution No. 89, dealing with deficiency judgments in connection with real-estate loans, was submitted by me on February 27, and was ordered to lie on the table. The resolution requests that the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration furnish certain information to the Senate, for the benefit of the Senate and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection to the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 89) submitted by Mr. SHIPSTEAD on February 27, 1939, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is requested to make a full and complete report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date with respect to the deficiency judgments which have been obtained by the Federal land banks and the land-bank commissioner in connection with loans made upon the security of real property. Such report shall include information with respect to (1) the number and total face amount of such judgments obtained by each of such banks and by the land-bank commissioner, (2) the sums which have been collected upon such judgments, and (3) any other facts in connection with the obtaining or collection of such judgments which the Governor may deem to be of interest to the Senate. Such information shall be listed by States and by calendar years and shall cover each of the years in which any such judgments may have been obtained by such banks or by the land-bank commissioner. For the purpose of this resolution any deficiency judgment which may have been obtained by the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation shall be deemed to have been obtained by the land-bank commissioner.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to be recognized for any purpose, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until 5 minutes to 12 a. m.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate (at 11 o'clock and 47 minutes a. m.) took a recess until 11:55 o'clock a. m., when it reassembled, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST CONGRESS—JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the terms of House Concurrent Resolution No. 4, heretofore agreed to by the Senate, today at 12 o'clock noon the Senate is to participate in a joint session of the two Houses for the purpose of commemorating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the meeting of the First Congress of the United States. As the time from now until 12 o'clock will be required to enable the Senate to reach the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Chair suggests, if it is agreeable, that the Senate now proceed in a body to the Chamber of the other House.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators who may not have been present yesterday, perhaps I should state that yesterday an order was entered that at the conclusion of the joint session the Senate stand adjourned until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms (Chesley W. Jurney), the Vice President, and the President pro tempore, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

(The full text of the proceedings in the Hall of the House of Representatives will be found in the proceedings of the House, p. 2246.)

ADJOURNMENT

At the conclusion of the joint meeting (at 1 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, the Senate stood adjourned until Monday, March 6, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1939

The House of Representatives met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious Lord of mankind, Thou wert our fathers' God. In Thee they trusted and were never put to shame. In darkness Thou didst give them light, in danger succor, and in perplexity guidance. Oh, blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord. Today we seek to do homage to it because of its ideals. Our soil bears the footprints of the glorious company of apostles of liberty and humanity. They closed old epochs and ushered in new ones by declaring the rights of God and man; may we ever love their labors with the breath of life. O breathe upon this great people the same wisdom, the same sacrificial devotion, and the same ambition for the highest treasures which bring in their train all earthly good. We love and cherish our homeland and rejoice that by Thy merciful providence we were reared beneath its benignant skies. Grant, blessed Lord, that a fervent and unwearied love of country may be so strong that tyrants and their cohorts may never be able to loosen the fireproof foundations of our democracy. Preserve us from all revolutionary passions and the rolling tides of war; continue to be the anchor of our Nation's thoughts and the guardian of its soul. Thine shall be the praise forever. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

At 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper, Mr. Joseph J. Sinnott, announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, the Vice President, and the President pro tempore, preceded by its Chief Clerk, Mr. John C. Crockett, and Sergeant at Arms, Col. Chesley W. Journey, entered the Chamber.

The Vice President took the chair to the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

Whereupon, the Speaker relinquished the gavel to the Vice President, who, as the Presiding Officer of the Joint Session of the two Houses, called the meeting to order.

The Doorkeeper announced the following guests of honor, who were escorted to the seats assigned to them:

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Ambassadors, the Ministers, and the Chargé d'Affaires of Foreign Governments.

The Chief of Staff of the United States Army, the Chief of Naval Operations of the United States Navy, the Major General Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, and the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The members of the President's Cabinet.

At 12 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m., the Doorkeeper announced the President of the United States, accompanied by the Joint Congressional Committee on Arrangements of the Senate and House, who was escorted to a seat on the Speaker's rostrum.

Miss Gladys Swarthout sang "America."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, Mr. BLOOM, a member of the Joint Committee on Arrangements, to read the concurrent resolution providing for the assembling of the two Houses of Congress in the Hall of the House of Representatives on this day for the purpose of holding fitting and proper exercises in commemoration of the One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Commencement of the First Congress of the United States under the Constitution.

Mr. BLOOM. On February 1, 1939, the following concurrent resolution was adopted by the Congress [reading]:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That in commemoration of the one hundred fiftieth anniversary of the First Congress of the United States under the Constitution, begun and held at the city of New York on Wednesday, the 4th of March 1789, the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 12 o'clock m., on Saturday, March 4, 1939.

That a joint committee consisting of five Members of the House of Representatives and five Members of the Senate shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, respectively, which is empowered to make suitable arrangements for fitting and proper exercises for the joint session of Congress herein authorized.

That invitations to attend the exercises be extended to the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Diplomatic Corps (through the Secretary of State), the General of the Armies, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Major General Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Commandant of the Coast Guard, and such other persons as the Joint Committee on Arrangements shall deem proper.

That the President of the United States is hereby invited to address the American people at the joint session of the Congress in commemoration of the one hundred fiftieth anniversary of the First Congress of the United States under the Constitution.

Adopted February 1, 1939.

Mr. BLOOM. Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honor to present the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD.

ADDRESS OF THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES HON. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD

Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, gentlemen of the Supreme Court, Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps, ladies, and gentlemen:

I feel very deeply my great good fortune in being the Speaker of the House today, because of that position I am the one privileged to welcome you to this Hall on this memorable occasion.

A mere century and a half is relatively a short span in the history of a nation, but when that period is the limit of the official life of the most powerful nation on earth, it assumes a vastly more comprehensive significance.

One hundred and fifty years ago this day there assembled in the city of New York the First Congress of the United States of America under its newly adopted Constitution. The mere statement of that incident carries only a reflection of the years that have passed, but in terms of what that occasion meant there has been no more arresting episode in the history of modern civilization. The proprieties of this occasion forbid even a casual review on my part of the historical background of the event we are convened to celebrate.

The student of the records of civilization always remembers a few outstanding things that have marked the progress of man from the dawn of organized society on through the tortuous and halting centuries in his search for a decent and stable formula of government that would combine into a compact of action the peace and security of peoples.

The Ten Commandments, the Sermon on the Mount, St. Paul at Rome, the voyages of Columbus, the Napoleonic wars, Magna Carta, the Declaration of Independence, and the establishment of our Constitution illustrate a few of the milestones that mark the pilgrimage of men on the journey from chaos to stability.

Today we may find the temper to forget advances in the realms of religion, science, discovery, warfare, and the cultural arts and fix our contemplation on government, and particularly our own Government.

There has been no period within the recollection of this generation more full of signs and portents than this present hour of the necessity of reappraising the soundness and desirability of our democratic form of government, and if it yet maintains the confidence and support of our people, and of other great nations of the world, as I believe to be the case, then it is our solemn duty to take every needful step and to assume every required obligation to preserve for our posterity the form and essence of a justly balanced and wisely conceived government for a free people. This obligation does not bear upon us as of selfish national concern for our own people alone, although that should always be our primary interest, but in addition thereto, it carries a profound moral obligation to our neighbors across the seas and in the Western Hemisphere, who have honored the prudence and wisdom of our founders by adopting in substance the theory of government that God has not yet created any one man wise enough or benevolent enough to fix and enforce his individual pattern to govern the hearts and minds and conscience and property and lives of every citizen under his jurisdiction. Democracy asserts the inalienable right of the people themselves, through orderly processes and under due restraints to contrive out of their collective judgment, through their legally chosen representatives, the means and measures by which they are to be prospered and protected in the age-old search for security and happiness.

That doctrine the people themselves long ago engrained and chiseled into the structure of our National Constitution. It is yet the sanctuary of our freedom, and the sheet anchor of all our liberties, possessing upon this great anniversary the affection and reverence of our citizens. There are evidences of certain sinister influences and minorities now seeking to sap and mine the pillars of this temple of freedom. We may have been too generous in our hospitality to them. We may have been too tolerant of some of their recent manifestations of subversive treachery. We have sought with rather grim patience to respect the guaranty of freedom of speech; but it may be only fair to admonish all such groups that they take counsel of their prudence lest by going one step too far, it will be too late to escape the wrath and indignation of all real Americans.

After such fragmentary observations of our situation and attitude the time and occasion draw our attention back to our fundamental law which authorizes this legislative assembly. We are still officially celebrating the sesquicentennial of the ratification of the Constitution. Our reverence and devotion to that document is augmented by the passing of the years. Its wisdom and philosophy have been tested by the whirlwinds of party passions, fratricidal warfare, and grave economic convulsions. The inspiration of its construction and the tenacity of its existence have fully justified the praise bestowed upon it by Mr. Gladstone, which we should never tire of remembering in these words:

As the British Constitution is the most subtle organism which has proceeded from the womb and long gestation of progressive history, so the American Constitution is, so far as I can see, the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

This anniversary conjures up in a parade of reverie and retrospection many solemn and yet comforting memories. Including the membership of the First Congress and up to the present session of the Seventy-sixth Congress 9,159 different individuals have served in the House and Senate. Thirteen hundred and sixty-two have served as Senators; 8,106 have served as Representatives; 450 have served in both Houses; 141 have served as Territorial Delegates and Commissioners.

What an intriguing pageant of brain and talent, of individuality and mannerism, of humor and pathos, of provincialism and scholarship! What a thrill of interest and admiration would we of this Congress obtain if we could see and hear many of those stalwarts of the long ago who so enthralled the admiration of their partisans and capitivated the idolatry of the masses! What a stimulation of the intellect to peruse the older records of debate between the master minds of other but unforgotten days.

For 138 years such Representatives and Senators have come into these Chambers, played their parts in the drama of representative government, made their contributions of service to their country's progress and development, and then are seen no more—either "beckoned by the pallid messenger with the inverted torch to depart" or returned to the walks of private life from whence they came. They served their day and generation.

To my brethren in both branches of Congress this should be embraced as an occasion of rededication to the best interests of our Republic. Despite the limitations of our judgments and intellects—because, forsooth, at no time nor under any administration, have we infallibly measured up to the full needs of the hour—nevertheless, we are the emissaries of our constituencies and the symbols of representative government. May we this day find the grace to renew the prayer of Daniel Webster, deposited in the cornerstone of this wing of the Capitol on July 4, 1851:

If, therefore, it shall be hereafter the will of God that this structure shall fall from its base, that its foundation be upturned, and this deposit brought to the eyes of men, be it then known, that, on this day, the Union of the United States of America stands firm, that their Constitution still exists unimpaired, and with all its original usefulness and glory; growing every day stronger and stronger in the affections of the great body of the American people, and attracting more and more the admiration of the world. And all here assembled, whether belonging to public life or to private life, with hearts devoutly thankful to Almighty God for the preservation of the liberty and happiness of the country, unite in sincere and fervent prayers that this deposit, and the walls and arches, the domes and towers, the columns and entablatures now to be erected over it may endure forever!

God save the United States of America!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, Mr. RAYBURN.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is a privilege at this time to present the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, Mr. KEY PITTMAN.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE OF THE SENATE HON. KEY PITTMAN

Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the Supreme Court, Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate, gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps, ladies, and gentlemen:

This in my opinion is the most remarkable and happiest birthday ever celebrated on behalf of a parliamentary body. This celebration is honored by the President of the United States and by the Chief Justice of the United States as heads of the other two great independent departments of our Government, the commanders in chief of every branch of our military service, and the diplomatic corps of the world.

We have just listened with intense interest and pleasure to the able and comprehensive address by the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives with regard to the organization, the composition, and the services of Congress. There is little more to be said upon that subject. I would be pleased were the time permitted me to pay tribute to the unselfish, able, and patriotic services of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate throughout their entire history. The Congress and the people of the country are waiting, however, to hear from our President and the Chief Justice of the United States.

When we realize what has been accomplished in the last 150 years, that period is exceedingly brief. When we consider, however, that this Government, established in great adversity, has continued without interruption and without change, except to grow stronger each year, 150 years may be deemed in the history of governments a very long period of time. In fact, I assume to assert that no other government has enjoyed the same undisturbed history.

The fundamental principles of our Government, embodied in our great Constitution and its Bill of Rights, have remained unchanged. The right and power of our citizens under their constitution to govern their own country has not been abridged, but has been broadened and strengthened. The three separate and independent branches of our Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—have remained inviolate and have constituted the anchor of our safety which has kept us off the rocks of chaos and revolution. Our Congress has held firmly to the principles under which and for which it was created. The Senate and the House of Representatives have always conscientiously and loyally performed the respective functions of their offices, and will, I am sure continue to do their part to protect our institutions and the liberty of our citizens. Their conduct and actions have conclusively demonstrated the wisdom of a representative form of government under a constitution such as ours.

Again I take the liberty of recalling to the minds of our citizens—although the history is well known to those present—the very difficult conditions under which our Government was formed, established, and maintained. Our population at that time consisted of only 4,000,000 people. These citizens were scattered over a pioneer country whose area was larger than that of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy combined. There were no railroads in those days; there were few wagon roads, and such as did exist were at times almost impassible. Our States were independent sovereignties, jealous of their rights and fearful of domination by a central government. This jealousy and fear was a natural threat to the successful formation and establishment of a sound central government under a constitution. That it was ever accomplished is the highest tribute that could be paid to the greatness and patriotism of our statesmen of that day.

The remarkable history of the creation, adoption, and ratification of our Constitution is recorded in the histories of every country.

On yesterday I picked up a musty old volume entitled "Annals of Congress, 1789-90." It is the original official proceedings of the First Congress of the United States. I think for historical purposes I may be permitted to read from this record just a few lines which to me are far more expressive than any language I could use relative to what actually took place upon the organization of the First Congress and the election of the first President and the first Vice President. I find here:

Proceedings of the Senate of the United States at the first session of the First Congress, begun at the city of New York, March 4, 1789.

And then follows this paragraph:

Wednesday, March 4, 1789: This being the day for the meeting of the new Congress, the following Members of the Senate appeared and took their seats:

From New Hampshire, John Langdon and Paine Wingate.
From Massachusetts, Caleb Strong.
From Connecticut, William S. Johnson and Oliver Ellsworth.
From Pennsylvania, William Maclay and Robert Morris.
From Georgia, William Few.

The Members present not being a quorum, they adjourned from day to day * * *

And so from day to day the Senate adjourned, awaiting the arrival of a quorum. The Senators were dragging their way through the muddy roads along the coast and over the Allegheny and Blue Ridge Mountains. And then I find this record:

Monday, April 6: Richard Henry Lee, from Virginia, then appearing, took his seat, and formed a quorum of the whole Senators of the United States.

The credentials of the Members present being read and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a President, for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

John Langdon was elected.

This language may be confusing to one not familiar with the procedure. From March 4 until April 6, when Richard Henry Lee took his seat, there being no quorum, the Senate could take no action. Until the ballots were counted it could not be officially determined who was elected Vice President. It was, therefore, necessary to elect a presiding officer to count the ballots. The record which I just read uses the word "President." What was meant was "Vice President pro tempore." Mr. Langdon was so designated in the record of April 21, which I will later read. He remained the Vice President pro tempore until the Vice President assumed the office. The office occupied by Mr. Langdon is now designated President pro tempore, as named in the Constitution.

This is the simple, yet dramatic statement of the organization of the United States Senate. Then continues the record of the counting of the electoral votes which resulted in the election of George Washington for President and John Adams for Vice President. It is but a brief statement, and, as it has probably been read by very few people, I believe it will be of interest to our citizens. I quote it:

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message; and Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The Speaker and the Members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber; and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which were as follows:

Then follows the vote of each State for each candidate. After the recording of this vote, we find the following entry in this old volume:

Whereby it appeared that George Washington, Esq., was elected President and John Adams, Esq., Vice President of the United States of America.

Mr. Madison, from the House of Representatives, thus addressed the Senate:

"Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and of the Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct."

And he withdrew.

Whereupon the Senate appointed Charles Thomson, Esq., to notify George Washington, Esq., of his election to the office of President of the United States of America, and Mr. Sylvanus Bourne to notify John Adams, Esq., of his election to the office of Vice President of the said United States.

What a precious record! How wonderful it is that so few men, acting with another small body of men in the House of Representatives, could so expeditiously and with such certainty—without precedent—safely and soundly inaugurate the greatest government in the world!

The next step upon the part of the Senate was the inauguration of the Vice President. It is interesting to see how simply this was done. I again read briefly from the Annals of that First Congress. I quote:

Tuesday, April 21: The committee appointed to conduct the Vice President to the Senate Chamber, executed their commission, and Mr. Langdon, the Vice President pro tempore, meeting the Vice President on the floor of the Senate Chamber, addressed him as follows:

"Sir, I have it in charge from the Senate to introduce you to the chair of this House, and also to congratulate you on your appointment to the office of Vice President of the United States of America."

After which Mr. Langdon conducted the Vice President to the chair, when the Vice President addressed the Senate.

I wish I had time to read you that speech.

This First Congress created the Supreme Court and the necessary inferior courts. It adopted complete rules for the government of the Senate. These rules remain substantially unchanged. There we find the rule providing for unlimited debate, which has made of the Senate the greatest deliberative body on earth.

On the 30th day of April George Washington took the oath of office and was inaugurated as President of the United States. And so was the modest beginning of our great Government, which has brought a greater degree of liberty, prosperity, and happiness to our people than is enjoyed anywhere else in the world—a government that is at peace with the world and respected by the world.

Mr. John Charles Thomas sang "God Bless Our Native Land."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. BARKLEY.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, since the 4th day of March 1789 there have been 8,124 men and women who have served in the House of Representatives. One thousand three hundred and eighty-four men and women have served in the United States Senate. The number of those who have served in both Houses is 461. The total number of persons who have served in the Cabinets of all the Presidents is 313. The number of individuals who have served as Governors of the various States is 1,558. There have been 42 Speakers of the House of Representatives; 32 different persons have served as Vice Presidents, of whom 6 have succeeded to the Presidency by virtue of the death of the President; 31 individuals have served as President. On the Supreme Court there have been 70 Associate Justices and 11 Chief Justices of the United States.

The Senate is sometimes referred to as the Nation's most exclusive club. In some respects it may be just that, but in many other respects it is no club. But if I might in my imagination create an exclusive club because of the small number of its Members, I would refer to it as the Association of Chief Justices. Two of the Chief Justices, Marshall and Taney, served a total of 63 years; only 12 years short of one-half the entire period since the organization of Congress in 1789.

The Supreme Court of the United States and the Chief Justices who have presided over it have exercised profound influence upon the political, social, and economic history of America and will undoubtedly continue to do so as the complexity of modern life continues to develop.

It is my great honor and no less a pleasure to present to you today the eleventh Chief Justice of the United States. He has already served longer than five of the other ten. Whether he shall outserve all of his predecessors, I make no prediction. I am happy to record that he seems to be in robust health of mind and body.

But whether he shall serve as long as Marshall or Taney or Waite or Fuller or White, I think posterity will assign to him a place among the ablest, most influential, and most profound jurists and legal philosophers who have ever served upon the bench or as its presiding Justice. In profound legal learning, in impressive exposition, in the dignity of his bearing, I dare say no previous Chief Justice excelled him. We all take pride in his contributions to the administrative and judicial history of America. I take pride in the broad accomplishments of his intellectual processes, as well as the depth of his moral foundations which are a part of his character and have made him so impressive a figure in whatever capacity he has chosen to occupy in his long public service.

I present to you the Chief Justice of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE UNITED STATES HON. CHARLES E. HUGHES

Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps, ladies, and gentlemen:

I thank you, Senator BARKLEY, from the depths of my heart for your very generous words.

LXXXIV—142

The most significant fact in connection with this anniversary is that after 150 years, notwithstanding expansion of territory, enormous increase in population and profound economic changes, despite direct attack and subversive influences, there is every indication that the vastly preponderant sentiment of the American people is that our form of government shall be preserved.

We come from our distinct departments of governmental activity to testify to our unity of aim in maintaining that form of government in accordance with our common pledge. We are here not as masters, but as servants, not to glory in power, but to attest our loyalty to the commands and restrictions laid down by our sovereign, the people of the United States, in whose name and by whose will we exercise our brief authority. If as such representatives we have, as Benjamin Franklin said, "no more durable preeminence than the different grains in an hourglass," we serve our hour by unremitting devotion to the principles which have given our Government both stability and capacity for orderly progress in a world of turmoil and revolutionary upheavals. Gratifying as is the record of achievement, it would be extreme folly to engage in mere laudation or to surrender to the enticing delusions of a thoughtless optimism. Forms of government, however well contrived, cannot assure their own permanence. If we owe to the wisdom and restraint of the fathers a system of government which has thus far stood the test, we all recognize that it is only by wisdom and restraint in our own day that we can make that system last. If today we find ground for confidence that our institutions which have made for liberty and strength will be maintained, it will not be due to abundance of physical resources or to productive capacity, but because these are at the command of a people who still cherish the principles which underlie our system and because of the general appreciation of what is essentially sound in our governmental structure.

With respect to the influences which shape public opinion, we live in a new world. Never have these influences operated more directly, or with such variety of facile instruments, or with such overwhelming force. We have mass production in opinion as well as in goods. The grasp of tradition and of sectional prejudice is loosened. Postulates of the past must show cause. Our institutions will not be preserved by veneration of what is old, if that is simply expressed in the formal ritual of a shrine. The American people are eager and responsive. They listen attentively to a vast multitude of appeals and, with this receptivity, it is only upon their sound judgment that we can base our hope for a wise conservatism with continued progress and appropriate adaptation to new needs.

We shall do well on this anniversary if the thought of the people is directed to the essentials of our democracy. Here in this body we find the living exponents of the principle of representative government, not government by direct mass action, but by representation which means leadership as well as responsiveness and accountability.

Here, the ground-swells of autocracy, destructive of parliamentary independence, have not yet upset or even disturbed the authority and responsibility of the essential legislative branch of democratic institutions. We have a national government equipped with vast powers which have proved to be adequate to the development of a great nation, and at the same time maintaining the balance between centralized authority and local autonomy. It has been said that to preserve that balance, if we did not have States we should have to create them. In our 48 States we have the separate sources of power necessary to protect local interests and thus also to preserve the central authority, in the vast variety of our concerns, from breaking down under its own weight. Our States, each with her historic background and supported by the loyal sentiment of her citizens, afford opportunity for the essential activity of political units, the advantages of which no artificial territorial arrangement could secure. If our checks and balances sometimes prevent the speedy action which is thought desirable, they also assure in the long run a more deliberate judgment. And what the people really want, they generally get. With the ultimate power of change through amendment in their hands they are always able to obtain whatever a preponderant and abiding sentiment strongly demands.

We not only praise individual liberty but our constitutional system has the unique distinction of insuring it. Our guarantees of fair trials, of due process in the protection of life, liberty, and property—which stands between the citizen and arbitrary power—of religious freedom, of free speech, free press and free assembly, are the safeguards which have been erected against the abuses threatened by gusts of passion and prejudice which in misguided zeal would destroy the basic interests of democracy. We protect the fundamental rights of minorities, in order to save democratic government from destroying itself by the excesses of its own power. The firmest ground for confidence in the future is that more than ever we realize that, while democracy must have its organization and controls, its vital breath is individual liberty.

I am happy to be here as the representative of the tribunal which is charged with the duty of maintaining, through the decision of controversies, these constitutional guaranties. We are a separate but not an independent arm of government. You, not we, have the purse and the sword. You, not we, determine the establishment and the jurisdiction of the lower Federal courts and the bounds of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The Congress first assembled on March 4, 1789, and on September 24, 1789, as its twentieth enactment, passed the Judiciary Act—to establish the judicial courts of the United States—a statute which is a monument of wisdom, one of the most satisfactory acts in the long history of notable congressional legislation. It may be said to take rank in our annals as next in importance to the Constitution itself.

In thus providing the judicial establishment, and in equipping and sustaining it, you have made possible the effective functioning of the department of government which is designed to safeguard with judicial impartiality and independence the interests of liberty. But in the great enterprise of making democracy workable we are all partners. One member of our body politic cannot say to another—"I have no need of thee." We work in successful cooperation by being true, each department to its own function, and all to the spirit which pervades our institutions—exalting the processes of reason, seeking through the very limitations of power the promotion of the wise use of power, and finding the ultimate security of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and the promise of continued stability and a rational progress, in the good sense of the American people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES HON. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Mr. Vice President, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the Supreme Court, Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps, ladies, and gentlemen:

We near the end of a 3-year commemoration of the founding of the Government of the United States. It has been aptly suggested that its successful organizing should rank as the eighth wonder of the world—for surely the evolution of permanent substance out of nebulous chaos justifies us in the use of superlatives.

Thus, we may increase our oratory and please our vanity by picturing the period of the War of the Revolution as crowded with a unanimous population of heroes dramatized by the admitted existence of a handful of traitors to fill the necessary role of villain. Nevertheless, we are aware today that a more serious reading of history depicts a far less pleasing scene.

It should not detract from our satisfaction in the result to acknowledge that a very large number of inhabitants of the thirteen revolting Colonies were opposed to rebellion and to independence; that there was constant friction between the Continental Congress and the Commander in Chief and his generals in the field; that inefficiency, regardless of the cause of it, was the rule rather than the exception in the long drawn out war; and finally that there is grave doubt as to whether independence would have been won at all if Great Britain herself had not been confronted with wars in Europe which diverted her attention to the maintenance of her own existence in the nearer arena.

We can at least give thanks that in the first chapter all was well that ended well, and we can at least give thanks to those outstanding figures who strove against great odds for the maintenance of the national ideal which their vision and courage had created.

The opening of the new chapter in 1783 discloses very definitely that assurance of continued independence could be guaranteed by none. Dissension and discord were so widely distributed among the 13 new States that it was impossible to set up a union more strong or permanent than that loose-end, shaky debating society provided for under the Articles of Confederation. That we survived for 6 years is more a tribute to the ability of the Confederation Congress gracefully to do nothing, and to the exhaustion that followed the end of the war, rather than to any outstanding statesmanship or even leadership. Again, we can properly say of the period of confederation that all was well that ended well.

Those years have rightly been called "the critical period of American history." But for crisis—in this case a crisis of peace—there would have been no union. You the Members of the Senate and the House; you the Chief Justice and Associate Justices; and I, the President of the United States, would not be here on this 4th of March, a century and a half later.

It is well to remember that from 1781 to 1789 the Thirteen Original States existed as a Nation by the single thread of congressional government and without an executive or a judicial branch. This annual assembly of Representatives, moreover, was compelled to act not by a majority but by States, and in the more important functions by the requirement that nine States must consent to the action.

In actual authority the Congresses of the Confederation were principally limited to the fields of external relations and the national defense. The fatal defect was, of course, the lack of power to raise revenue for the maintenance of the system, and our ancestors may be called, at the least, optimistic if they believed that 13 sovereign republics would promptly pay over to the confederation even the small sums which were assessed against them for the annual maintenance of the Congress and its functions.

Furthermore, the effect of the existing methods of transportation and communication retarded the development of a truly national government far more greatly than we realize today—and that was true throughout the first half century of our Union. You have heard the phrase "the horse-and-buggy age." We use it not in derogation of the men who had to spend weeks on the rough highways before they could establish a quorum of the Congress, not in implication of inferiority on the part of those who perforce could not visit their neighbors in other States and visualize at first hand the problems of the whole of an infant nation.

We use it rather to explain the tedious delays and the local antagonisms and jealousies which beset our early paths, and we use it perhaps to remind our citizens of today that the automobile, the railroad, the airplane, the electrical impulse over the wire and through the ether leave to no citizen an excuse for sectionalism, for delay in the execution of the public business, or for a failure to maintain a full understanding of the acceleration of the processes of civilization.

Thus the crisis which faced the new Nation through its lack of national powers was recognized as early as 1783, but the very slowness of contacts prevented a sufficient general perception of the danger until 1787, when the Congress of the Confederation issued a call for the holding of a Constitutional Convention in May.

We are familiar with the immortal document which issued from that Convention; of the ratification of it by sufficient States to give it effect; of the action of the Confederation Congress which terminated its own existence in calling on the First Federal Congress to assemble on March 4, 1789.

We know of the month's delay before a quorum could be attained, of the counting of the ballots unanimously cast for General Washington, of his notification, of his triumphal journey from Mount Vernon to New York, and of his inauguration as first President on April 30.

So ended the crisis. So from a society of 13 republics was born a nation with the attributes of nationality and the framework of permanence.

I believe that it has been held by the Supreme Court that the authority of the Articles of Confederation ended on March 3, 1789. Therefore, the Constitution went into effect the next day.

That Constitution was based on the theory of representative government, two of the three branches of its government being chosen by the people, directly in the case of the House of Representatives, by elected legislatures in the case of Senators, and by elected electors in the case of the President and the Vice President. It is true that in many States the franchise was greatly limited, yet the cardinal principle of free choice by the body politic prevailed. I emphasize the words "free choice" because until a very few years ago this fundamental, or perhaps I should call it this ideology of democracy, was in the ascendant throughout the world, and nation after nation was broadening its practice of what the American Constitution had established here so firmly and so well.

The safety of the system of representative democracy is, in the last analysis, based on two essentials: First, that at frequent periods the voters must choose a new Congress and a new President; and second, that this choice must be made freely, that is to say without any undue force against or influence over the voter in the expression of his personal and sincere opinion.

That, after all, is the greatest difference between what we know as democracy and those other forms of government which, though they seem new to us, are essentially old—for they revert to those systems of concentrated self-perpetuating power against which the representative democratic system was successfully launched several centuries ago.

Today, with many other democracies, the United States will give no encouragement to the belief that our processes are outworn, or that we will approvingly watch the return of forms of government which for 2,000 years have proved their tyranny and their instability alike.

With the direct control of the free choosing of public servants by a free electorate, the Constitution has proved that this type of government cannot long remain in the hands of those who seek personal aggrandizement for selfish ends, whether they act as individuals, as classes, or as groups.

It is, therefore, in the spirit of our system that our elections are positive in their mandate, rather than passive in their acquiescence. Many other nations envy us the enthusiasm, the attacks, the wild overstatements, the falsehood intermingled gayly with the truth that marks our general elections, because they are promptly followed by acquiescence in the result and a return to calmer waters as soon as the ballots are counted.

We celebrate the completion of the building of the constitutional house. But one essential was lacking—for the house had to be made habitable. And even in the period of the building, those who put stone upon stone, those who voted to accept it from the hands of the builders, knew that life within the house needed other things for its inhabitants. Without those things, indeed, they could never be secure in their tenure, happy in their toil and in their rest.

And so there came about that tacit understanding that to the Constitution would be added a bill of rights. Well and truly did the First Congress of the United States fulfill that first unwritten pledge; and the personal guaranties thus given to our individual citizens have established, we trust for all time, what has become as ingrained in our American natures as the free elective choice of our representatives itself.

In that Bill of Rights lies another vast chasm between our representative democracy and those reversions to personal rule which have characterized these recent years.

Jury trial: Do the people of our own land ever stop to compare that blessed right of ours with some processes of trial and punishment which of late have reincarnated the "justice" of the Dark Ages?

The taking of private property without due compensation: Would we willingly abandon our security against that in the face of the events of recent years?

The right to be safe against unwarrantable searches and seizures: Read your newspapers and rejoice that our firesides and our households are still safe.

Freedom to assemble and petition the Congress for a redress of grievances: The mail and the telegraph bring daily proof to every Senator and every Representative that that right is at the height of an unrestrained popularity.

Freedom of speech—yes, that, too, is unchecked, for never has there been so much of it on every side of every subject; it is indeed a freedom which because of the mildness of our laws of libel and slander goes unchecked except by the good sense of the American people. Any person is constitutionally entitled to criticize and call to account the highest and the lowest in the land—save only in one exception. For be it noted that the Constitution itself protects Senators and Representatives and provides that "for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place." And that immunity is most carefully not extended to either the Chief Justice or the President.

Freedom of the press: I take it that no sensible man or woman believes that it has been curtailed or threatened or that it should be. The influence of the printed word will always depend on its veracity, and the Nation can safely rely on the wise discrimination of a reading public which, with the increase in the general education, is able to sort truth from fiction. Representative democracy will never tolerate suppression of true news at the behest of government.

Freedom of religion: That essential of the rights of mankind everywhere goes back also to the origins of representative government. Where democracy is snuffed out, there, too, the right to worship God in one's own way is circumscribed or abrogated. Shall we by our passiveness, by our silence, by assuming the attitude of the Levite who pulled his skirts together and passed by on the other side, lend encouragement to those who today persecute religion or deny it?

The answer to that is "no," just as in the days of the First Congress of the United States it was "no."

Not for freedom of religion alone does this Nation contend by every peaceful means. We believe in the other freedoms of the Bill of Rights, the other freedoms that are inherent in the right of free choice by free men and women. That means democracy to us under the Constitution, not democracy by direct action of the mob; but democracy exercised by representatives chosen by the people themselves.

Here in this great Hall are assembled the present members of the Government of the United States of America—the Congress, the Supreme Court, and the Executive. Our fathers rightly believe that this Government which they set up would seek as a whole to act as a whole for the good governing of the Nation. It is in the same spirit that we are met here today, 150 years later, to carry on their task. May God continue to guide our steps.

Miss Gladys Swarthout and Mr. John Charles Thomas sang "The Star-Spangled Banner."

BENEDICTION

Rev. Z. Barney Thorne Phillips, D. D., LL. D., Chaplain of the Senate, pronounced the benediction, as follows:

Unto God's graciousness, tender mercy, and protection we commit you and every citizen of this Nation this day. May the Lord bless us and keep us. May the Lord make His face to shine upon us and be gracious unto us. May He take us in His arms of love and mercy and give us a sense of His own indwelling and of His power. May He lift up the light of His countenance upon us and give us that peace which the world can neither give nor take away, that peace that passeth all understanding. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Joint Session of the Congress which assembled for the purpose of holding fitting and proper exercises in commemoration of the One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Commencement of the First Congress of the United States under the Constitution is now dissolved.

Thereupon,

The Joint Congressional Committee on Arrangements escorted the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet from the Hall of the House.

The Doorkeeper escorted the other invited guests of honor from the Hall of the House in the following order:

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court.

The Ambassadors, the Ministers, and the Chargés d'Affaires of Foreign Governments.

The Chief of Staff of the United States Army; the Chief of Naval Operations of the United States Navy; the Major General Commandant of the United States Marine Corps; and the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Upon the retirement of the guests, the Senate returned to its Chamber, and the House of Representatives resumed its session.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the proceedings in the House today will be included in the RECORD of this date.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House will stand adjourned until 12 o'clock on Monday.

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 6, 1939, at 12 o'clock noon.

1532. By Mr. SCHIFFLER: Petition of Rev. Joseph I. Gregory, of Cameron, W. Va., urging that ministers be excluded from the provisions of the Social Security Act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1533. By Mr. WOLCOTT: Petition of Mr. Tom O'Shea and nine others, of Kinde, Mich., extending the Neutrality Act of August 31, 1935, to include civil as well as international conflicts, and to retain on our statute books the principle enunciated in the act of May 1, 1937; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1534. Also, petition of R. L. Tibbetts and 49 others, of Vassar, Caro, Tuscola, Mich., to continue the Dies committee investigation; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1939

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who livest and reignest, throned above space and time, in that realm where freedom and law are one: Move with Thy creative word, new every morning, upon the chaos of our world, that peace and harmony may be established among us. Thou knowest us to be set in the midst of so many and great dangers that, by reason of our frailty, we cannot always stand upright; we, therefore, pray Thee to renew in us the eternal miracle of faith, made ampler as we listen to the simple seas that ebb and flow, and reason is revealed as song breathed into our quiet hearts; impart to us Thy strength to walk with love through joy and grief as we lay hold of life's infinitude, that at the last we may find Thee waiting, beyond our wildest hope, beyond the last horizon of our pain, to receive us to Thy heart into the heaven of heavens. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Saturday, March 4, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations and a treaty were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Hess, one of his secretaries.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS COMMEMORATING ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST CONGRESS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, last Saturday, at the joint session of the two Houses, very impressive ceremonies were conducted, celebrating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of Congress, on the 4th of March 1789. There has been, among all classes of people, universal acclaim with reference to that program. It was one of the most impressive ceremonies I have ever witnessed in the Congress or out of it. The desire has been very generally expressed that the entire proceedings be given as wide circulation as possible throughout the country. Looking to that end, I ask unanimous consent that the entire proceedings of the joint session, held last Saturday in the Hall of the House of Representatives, be made a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to say that I intend to confer with the Joint Committee on Printing and the Committee on Appropriations to see whether we may not, within reasonable expense, secure the printing of a large number of copies of this document for circulation throughout the country.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of Vermont, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Whereas it is very apparent to the residents of the State of Vermont and particularly to the producers of primary products that there is a grave disparity between prices received by primary producers for their products produced in Vermont and the fixed charges which are attendant upon the producers; and

Whereas it appears that the price structure in our country is not in equilibrium as between agriculture, industry, and labor; and

Whereas our natural instinct tells us that something is wrong with the present monetary situation in this country; and

Whereas article I, section 8, clause 5 of the United States Constitution gives exclusive power to the Federal Government to provide a currency for all the States, to coin money, and regulate the value thereof: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That it is the opinion of this legislature that there should be an immediate and thorough study by the Congress of the United States, through a special committee, of the reason for the grave disparity that now exists in all parts of the country between prices to primary producers and the fixed charges that are attendant upon them; to investigate carefully the monetary system of this country with the view of correcting evils that are now apparent and with a view of bringing to this country a better monetary system; and to report their findings at an early date to the Congress of the United States for proper action;

That the secretary of state be directed to send a certified copy of this resolution to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of Vermont's Senators and Representative in Congress.
Approved March 3, 1939.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolution memorializing Congress to erect an additional building in Santa Fe to house United States Government departments and employees located in Santa Fe

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, That whereas the State of New Mexico at the present is permitting the use of her buildings by the United States Government for its departments and officials, located in the State of New Mexico; and

Whereas some of the departments of the State of New Mexico are required to rent other buildings or establishments for its own State departments in Santa Fe and other cities; and

Whereas the State of New Mexico is greatly in need of its buildings, already constructed; and

Whereas this State has no desire to inconvenience the Government of the United States in the State of New Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, That the Congress of the United States, be and it is petitioned and memorialized to erect additional buildings of the United States Government, for the purpose of housing and furnishing offices for its departments and officials in this State, and that such buildings be erected in the city of Santa Fe, in the State of New Mexico, to the end, that the State of New Mexico and its several departments located at its State capitol, may expeditiously and economically cooperate with the United States Government in its activities in this State; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution under the great seal of the State be forwarded to the Right Honorable JOHN N. GARNER, Vice President of the United States of America, and to the Honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the Honorable Senator CARL A. HATCH, the Honorable Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ, and the Honorable JOHN J. DEMPSEY, Member of the House of Representatives for the State of New Mexico in the Congress of the United States.

Approved by me this 1st day of March 1939.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that—

Whereas there exists within the Pacific Northwest a condition of economic distress which has caused widespread unemployment, creating much suffering and want of necessities of life among a great many of the people of said area; and

Whereas the Pacific Northwest is without proper military protection, in that said section is wholly cut off from the East by the Bitter Root Mountains, with only one passage through said range from the Canadian border to Bannock Pass, a distance of some 800 miles; and

Whereas it has become the public policy as well as the urgent need of the United States to take affirmative steps to relieve the conditions aforesaid; and

Whereas the Lewis and Clark Highway follows a low-elevation water grade from Portland, Oreg., across the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, through the Lolo Pass, the lowest pass in the Bitter Root range, and which is centrally located, to Missoula, Mont., and will provide an adequate military and commercial route, which is so badly needed; and

Whereas the Lewis and Clark Highway has been completed with the exception of only 50 miles which lies wholly within the national forests of Idaho, and appropriations for forest roads in national forests, which in Idaho cover 34,000,000 of its total 53,000,000 acres, are inadequate to provide for completion of said highway from that source; and

Whereas these national forests are of the largest, most beautiful, interesting, and valuable of the national forests, affording unsurpassed recreational opportunities for the people of the entire Nation, and is not accessible either by rail or national highway; and

Whereas this highway would be of great benefit to the States of Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Oregon to facilitate marketing of their products; would provide adequate military protection to the Pacific Northwest; would provide adequate employment to reduce the critical effect of the present economic distress in this area; and would stimulate national trade and commerce; and

Whereas the Lewis and Clark Highway has been designated as eligible for Federal aid:

Now, therefore, we, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, do hereby most respectfully urge on your honorable body, the Congress of the United States, that your honorable body pass such legislation and make the necessary appropriations to provide for and complete construction of the unfinished portion of said highway above mentioned, and that the Forest Service in the Department of Agriculture and/or the War Department and/or the Department of the Interior of the United States be authorized and directed to begin immediate construction thereon: Be it

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized, and is hereby directed, to immediately forward certified copies of this joint memorial to the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of War, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to Senators and Representatives in Congress from the States of Idaho, Oregon, Washington, and Montana, and to the President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following letter from the Governor of Nevada and a joint resolution of the Legislature of Nevada, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

STATE OF NEVADA,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Carson City, February 22, 1939.

HON. JOHN N. GARNER,

President of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you herewith copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 2, relative to the protection, use, and development of the natural resources of the western region, which was passed by the Nevada State Legislature during the current session and approved by me on February 18, 1939.

Very sincerely yours,

E. P. CARVILLE, Governor.

Senate joint resolution relative to the protection, use, and development of the natural resources of the western region

Whereas Nature has bestowed upon the State of Nevada a priceless heritage of natural resources of soil, water, forests, minerals, forage, game animals, birds, fish, and scenic and recreational attractions; and

Whereas these natural resources are vital to the permanence and future growth and prosperity of the basic industry of the State and to the welfare and happiness of its citizens; and

Whereas the protection and wise use of our valuable natural resources is the responsibility of the Federal and State Governments and the civic duty of all our people; and

Whereas large areas of Nevada's important watersheds, forests, grazing and mineral lands, fishing streams and lakes, wildlife ranges, free public playgrounds, and scenic features are found within the national forests in the State; and

Whereas these national-forest resources are protected and managed for the benefit of all our citizens and the permanence of our industries and are open at all times to full utilization and economic development; and

Whereas there is now pending national legislation which will create a new national park in the middle and south forks of Kings River that will remove large water and other natural resources from the use and development of adjacent dependent communities; and

Whereas similar lands and resources are embraced in the Mono, Tahoe, Toiyabe, and other national forests in Nevada and immediately adjacent thereto and may eventually be affected by similar legislation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of Nevada, jointly, That the State of Nevada through its legislature recommends to the President and to the Congress of the United States that all national-forest lands and their valuable natural resources be permanently retained in national-forest status under the protection and administration of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture, where they will be perpetually open, as needed, to all measures, developments, and activities necessary for the full use, regulation, and control of the land and the resources thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of Nevada is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and to Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and to the Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief of the Forest Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

House Concurrent Resolution 13

Concurrent resolution proposing by this resolution intended as a petition to the Congress of the United States that the Congress provide by law for the creation of a Special Claims Commission to meet with the Sioux Indians of South Dakota to effectuate prompt settlement of individual or tribal Indian claims presented and filed under the laws and treaties of the United States with said Indian tribes

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Legislative Session of the State of South Dakota (the senate concurring):

Whereas Congress did enact into law, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, certain provisions intended to fulfill, and make compliance with, various stipulations and agreements as were provided for in treaties with the several Indian tribes; and

Whereas many claims presented by the Indians and Indian tribal organizations over a period of many years, which claims arose from alleged violations of treaty rights and under the provisions of said above-mentioned act of Congress, have not been acted on or finally determined, and such claims are now pending in the courts of the United States, in some cases for many years; and

Whereas other and additional claims under such act and treaties will be filed from time to time, for redress or for benefits claimed to be due to such Indians and Indian tribes, and according to the present laws with respect to Indian claims must be litigated in the courts with no prospect of final adjudication for many years, after the instituting of said actions; and

Whereas the Sioux and other tribes of Indians are, and have been, entitled to a prompt settlement of said claims, and the delay experienced has been to the great loss and inconvenience of said Indians; and

Whereas the Sioux Indians of South Dakota are now in dire need, and that it is imperative for their best interest and health that their claims be promptly adjusted, and that in the meantime adequate provisions be made for them as to necessary food and clothing and necessities of life: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That for the best interests of the Sioux Indians of South Dakota, the Congress provide by law for the creation of a Special Claims Commission, with the power and authority and jurisdiction to meet with such Indians or tribal councils and their attorneys, promptly after the filing of any claim or claims, and settle, compromise, and adjudicate said claim or claims; be it further

Resolved, That this joint resolution is intended as a petition to the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

House Concurrent Resolution 11

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to enact suitable legislation if necessary, or if not necessary, to secure such department rulings as will provide for a reimbursement to counties and their several units of the funds lost to such by the withdrawal of so-called submarginal lands from taxation

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the senate concurring):

Whereas the Federal Government of the United States has purchased large tracts of deeded land in the State of South Dakota and other Northwestern States, which lands were termed as "submarginal" and by such purchase and acquirement has taken such lands off the tax lists where such lands exist, thereby eliminating, to a greater or less extent, the resources for the proper function of local government and the payment of bonded indebtedness existing on said land at the time it was so purchased; and

Whereas the burden of taxation on the property owners who were not given an opportunity to sell their property is by reason thereof increasing to a point beyond their ability to pay: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Congress be urged to enact suitable legislation, if necessary, or if not necessary, to secure such department rulings as will provide for an equitable reimbursement to counties and their several units of the funds lost to such by the withdrawal of such so-called submarginal lands from taxation; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Senator and Representative of the State of South Dakota in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

House Joint Memorial 17

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in fourteenth regular session assembled, respectfully submits that:

Whereas by authority of Congress (Public, No. 564, ch. 299, 75th Cong., 3d sess.) there has been appointed an "Alaskan International Highway Commission" which is directed and empowered to cooperate with a similar Canadian commission "for the survey, location, and construction of a highway to the Pacific Northwest part of continental United States with British Columbia and the Yukon Territory . . . and the Territory of Alaska"; and

Whereas said Commission has entered into negotiations and is cooperating with a similar commission representing the Dominion of Canada, and jointly they are studying routes, costs, and methods of financing; and

Whereas the construction of such a highway would promote a more orderly and systematic development of the natural resources of Alaska and further the cause of orderly development; and

Whereas the interests of national defense would be greatly served by this project; and

Whereas to connect the proposed highway from the western boundary of the Yukon Territory with the existing interior Alaskan road system will require the construction of 183 miles of road in Alaska, at an estimated cost of $2,250,000; and

Whereas the route for this road traverses regions known to be highly mineralized and where industrial development is now almost impossible because of lack of transportation facilities and abnormally high costs of operation: Now, therefore

Your memorialist respectfully urges that an appropriation in that amount be immediately made to the end that work may be initiated without delay.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Joint Memorial 27

To the President of the United States, to the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and to the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represents:

Whereas the city of Nome is the principal port in northwestern Alaska, where the commerce and business of that large part of the Territory of Alaska centers; and

Whereas it is the principal port in the second division of Alaska, where freight and passenger steamers and other vessels unload their passengers and cargo; and

Whereas it is an unprotected roadstead and subject to severe storms; and

Whereas there are seven other ports within 150 miles of Nome where freight and passenger steamers and other vessels unload their freight and passengers from unprotected roadsteads; and

Whereas, due to long distances from Nome to other coastal ports, towns, and villages that from time to time are in need of immediate succor and aid, a Coast Guard plane equipped for northern flying should be a part of the station's equipment; and

Whereas for more than 29 years the United States Government has maintained at Nome a Coast Guard station efficiently manned and equipped, which has been of great service in saving life and property; and

Whereas said Coast Guard station and a portion of its equipment were destroyed by fire on September 17, 1934:

Now, therefore, we, your memorialists, respectfully pray that said Coast Guard station be rebuilt at Nome, Alaska, without delay and be adequately equipped and manned for service.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Senate Joint Memorial 6

To the honorable the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Delegate in Congress from Alaska:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in fourteenth regular session assembled, respectfully submits that:

Whereas there is now operating in the Territory of Alaska a native-owned cannery located on a Federal Government reservation which competes in one of Alaska's major industries, but which is exempt from all Territorial taxation; and

Whereas the establishment of more fisheries reservations of a like nature is being urged by Federal Government officials and others; and

Whereas Federal Government loans are now being granted to subsidize native-owned cooperative canneries; and

Whereas if such reservations and cooperatives are allowed to operate without being subject to equal Territorial taxation with other members of the industry the Territorial income will be jeopardized: Now therefore

Your memorialist respectfully urges that Congress immediately empower the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska to impose and collect equal taxes on all canneries and cannery products established on and operated on Indian reservations or a cooperative basis in Alaska.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Utah, favoring the enactment of the so-called McCarran bill to stabilize the price of silver at $1 per ounce, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. THOMAS of Utah.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a meeting held under the auspices of the American Labor Party Clubs in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth assembly districts of New York, N. Y., favoring an additional appropriation of $150,000,000 for the activities of the W. P. A. during the remainder of the current fiscal year, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of Local Industrial Union No. 2, United Chocolate Workers, of Hershey, Pa., favoring an adequate appropriation for the National Labor Relations Board and protesting against any amendment of the National Labor Relations Act, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, Calif., favoring the permanent assignment of one-half of the fleet for operations in Pacific waters, with San Francisco Bay as its headquarters and base, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of members of the Portland (Maine) League for Peace and Freedom, praying that the embargo be lifted on the shipment of arms and munitions to Spain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution of Puritan Lodge No. 621, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Boston, Mass., favoring the enactment of the bill (S. 1112) to further amend the act entitled "An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1935, as amended, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Galesburg, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to exempt small independent telephone companies from the provisions of the Labor Standards Act of 1938, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oxford and members of the First Baptist Church of Wichita, in the State of Kansas, praying for the adoption by the United States of a policy of nonparticipation in aggression and also the discontinuance of shipments of war supplies to Japan, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of members of Parent-Teacher Association units of Ford County, Kans., praying for the enactment of the so-called Neely bill, to prohibit the block booking and blind selling of motion-picture films, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented memorials of members and friends of the Friendship Baptist Church, of Patterson; the pastor and officers of the Presbyterian Church of Carlton; the pastor, officers, and members of the First Baptist Church of Belle Plaine, and members and friends of the First Baptist Church of Hope, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to include religious bodies under the operation of the social-security system, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution of the Parent-Teacher Association of the John Burroughs School, Washington, D. C., favoring a deficiency appropriation for heating and lighting school buildings, and also for teachers' salaries in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. RADCLIFFE jointly presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Senate resolution concerning certain bills which have been introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress of the United States

Whereas certain bills have been introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress, including Senate Joint Resolution 27, Senate Joint Resolution 58, S. 126, S. 137, S. 158, House Joint Resolution 152, H. R. 188, H. R. 3369, and H. R. 3749, which, if passed, would adversely affect the interests of labor and all forms of business in Maryland; and

Whereas the objective of these bills is the dissolution of the present territorial freight rate structure of the country and the establishment of a structure under which (1) the rates within and between all territories would be on the same mile-for-mile level or (2) the rates from one territory into another would not exceed the level, distance considered, within the destination territory, which would result in higher interterritorial rates in one direction than in another between the same points and over the same routes; and

Whereas in the natural development of the rate structure, the United States has been divided into several recognized rate territories or zones because of differences in volume of tonnage, traffic density, and cost of transportation, which natural grouping has existed for many years and to which industry and business have become adjusted; and

Whereas Maryland is located in the rate territory lying to the east of the Mississippi River and roughly north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers, designated as official classification territory, in which, by reason of the great industrial activity and consequent high traffic density and low operating costs, the average per-mile rate level is lower than in other rate territories; and

Whereas passage of these bills, or any of them, would deprive the Interstate Commerce Commission of its present authority and duty as the agency of Congress, to determine rate levels within and between the several rate territories, upon consideration of evidence as to traffic density, operating costs, or other factors affecting transportation, and, by specific rule of Congress, require revision of existing territorial rate differences without regard to the varying transportation conditions in the different territories; and

Whereas any such legislation would, by disregarding the natural advantages existing in the territory in which Maryland is located, seriously and permanently injure industry and business in Maryland, and correspondingly reduce employment and the opportunity for employment, and discourage industrial expansion and induce the removal of industry to other territories, contrary to the public interest: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the Senate of Maryland, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Maryland be and they are hereby urged to use their every effort to prevent passage of any of the said bills or resolutions or any other legislation of like character; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate forward a copy of this resolution to each Member of the present Congress from Maryland.

House resolution concerning certain bills which have been introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress of the United States

Whereas certain bills have been introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress, including Senate Joint Resolution 27, Senate Joint Resolution 58, S. 126, S. 137, S. 158, House Joint Resolution 152, H. R. 188, H. R. 3369, and H. R. 3749, which, if passed, would adversely affect the interests of labor and all forms of business in Maryland; and

Whereas the objective of these bills is the dissolution of the present territorial freight-rate structure of the country and the establishment of a structure under which (1) the rates within and between all territories would be on the same mile-for-mile level, or (2) the rates from one territory into another would not exceed the level, distance considered, within the destination territory, which would result in higher interterritorial rates in one direction than in another between the same points and over the same routes; and

Whereas in the natural development of the rate structure, the United States has been divided into several recognized rate territories or zones because of differences in volume of tonnage, traffic density, and cost of transportation, which natural grouping has existed for many years and to which industry and business have become adjusted; and

Whereas Maryland is located in the rate territory lying to the east of the Mississippi River and roughly north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers, designated as official classification territory, in which, by reason of the great industrial activity and consequent high-traffic density and low-operating costs, the average per-mile rate level is lower than in other rate territories; and

Whereas any such legislation would, by disregarding the natural advantages existing in the territory in which Maryland is located, seriously and permanently injure industry and business in Maryland, and correspondingly reduce employment and the opportunity for employment, and discourage industrial expansion and induce the removal of industry to other territories, contrary to the public interest: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Delegates of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Maryland be, and they are hereby, urged to use their every effort to prevent passage of any of the said bills or resolutions or any other legislation of like character; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the house forward a copy of this resolution to each Member of the present Congress from Maryland.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah presented the following resolution of the Legislature of Utah, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Memorializing Congress to initiate a movement to give silver a standing by the approval of the McCarran bill to stabilize the price of silver at $1 per ounce

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah:

Whereas most of the States west of the Missouri River produce silver, thus making mining of nonferrous metals containing silver basic industries in the respective States mentioned below; and

Whereas the present price of domestically mined silver in the United States expires by statutory limitations on July 1, 1939; and

Whereas it is essential to the well-being and future welfare of these States that something be done by the Congress of the United States, now in session, to stabilize domestically mined silver; and

Whereas there has lately been introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill by Senator PAT MCCARRAN, of Nevada, stabilizing the price of silver at $1 per ounce; and

Whereas this legislature believes that the stabilization of silver at that price will be conducive of future prosperity of the nations; and

Whereas if something drastic is not done by Congress relative to silver before July 1, 1939, many thousands of miners will be unemployed and interdependent industries affected: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Utah declares its endorsement of the McCarran bill and respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to enact said bill into law; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and the congressional representatives of Utah; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the Governor and secretary of state to the respective legislatures of the following: Territory of Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, South Dakota, Tennessee, and Texas.

Mrs. CARAWAY presented the following concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

House Concurrent Resolution 19

Whereas the citizens of 10 States bordering on the Mississippi River have initiated a movement to obtain the authorization by Congress of a National Parkway to begin at the source of the Mississippi River in Minnesota and extend to the Gulf below New Orleans; and

Whereas the States through which such a highway will be located have one-fourth of the Nation's population and have 6,000,000 registered automobiles and is the Nation's most fertile agricultural section, and such a roadway as the Mississippi River Parkway would be a means of bringing a "market to the farms" as a result of a vast movement of tourists; and

Whereas this legislature has passed, and the Governor has approved Act No. 45, 1939, making it possible for this State to cooperate with the Federal Government in this project, being the first of the 10 States to pass enabling legislation with respect to this project; and

Whereas the Congress has authorized the construction of two parkways of the nature of the Mississippi River Parkway, both of which are now under construction, namely, the Blue Ridge Parkway of Virginia and North Carolina, between the Shenandoah National Park and the Smoky Mountain National Park and the Natchez Trace Parkway through the States of Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi. These projects are now employing thousands of people who would be otherwise unemployed. We have in this State a large number of unemployed persons who can be given employment on a project of the magnitude of the proposed Mississippi River Parkway; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in Congress (H. R. 3759, by Congressman DeROUEN) which has for its purpose the authorization of the Mississippi River Parkway, surveys, and estimates: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the fifty-second general assembly (both houses concurring therein), That this representative group of Arkansas citizenship hereby petition the United States Congress to enact the legislation embodied in Congressman DeROUEN's measure (H. R. 3759) to authorize surveys and estimates for the Mississippi River Parkway, and upon completion of such surveys that the Congress make necessary appropriations from time to time until this meritorious project has been completed; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution shall be forwarded to His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt; to the Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Harold Ickes; to the Secretary of Agriculture, the Honorable Henry A. Wallace; and to each member of Arkansas' delegation in the United States Congress.

RAILWAY LEGISLATION

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, resolutions adopted by the Order of Benefit Association of Railway Employees, on February 28, 1939, and sent to me by P. W. Kolip, secretary of Dunmore Division, No. 80, 976 Union Avenue, Scranton, Pa., which I have received, together with many similar resolutions or petitions.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the welfare of the public generally and the welfare of hundreds of thousands of railroad employees particularly is being damaged by delay in the enactment of legislation to establish a new transportation policy fitted to the competitive conditions under which rail transportation must now be furnished to the public; and

Whereas it is commonly agreed that the railroads and their employees are suffering from unnatural conditions in large part due to unequal and unjust public policies with respect to all transportation; and

Whereas President Roosevelt in recognition of these facts appointed a joint committee consisting of qualified representatives of railroad managements and railroad employees to formulate suitable recommendations for legislation to right the damage and wrongs of the present policies and which committee has presented its recommendations to President Roosevelt: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this lodge endorse the program submitted by the President's committee and that the special attention of our representatives in Congress be directed to our support of that program and the interest of railroad employees generally in the subject, and the present need of legislation to remove present injustices which affect our jobs and wages adversely; and be it further

Resolved, That our representatives in Congress be requested to join us in active and persistent support of this program, especially as to changes in rate-making regulations, including modification of the long-and-short-haul clause, as being necessary to enable railroads to meet rate competition of highway and waterway carriers, to removal of subsidies to other forms of transportation and repeal of the land-grant rate law; and be it further

Resolved, That our secretary forward copies of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and that he request them to advise us periodically as to their progress in enacting legislation to make the recommendations of the President's committee effective.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1281) to prohibit reproductions of official badges, identification cards, and other insignia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 132) thereon.

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Civil Service, to which was referred the bill (S. 827) for the relief of John H. Barry, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 133) thereon.

S. 1711. A bill for the relief of J. Harry Walker; and

S. 1712. A bill for the benefit of the Indians of the Crow Reservation, Mont., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

S. 1713. A bill for the relief of Milton J. Byars; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mrs. CARAWAY:

S. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution to authorize the painting of the scene at the signing of the Constitution for placement in the Capitol Building; to the Committee on the Library.

REPEAL OF UNDISTRIBUTED-PROFITS TAX

Mr. KING. I introduce a bill, the purpose of which is to repeal absolutely even the shadow, if there be any shadow or substance left of it, of the undistributed-profits tax.

The bill does not change the provisions of existing law extending special relief to small corporations with net incomes of less than $25,000. However, those corporations which under the existing law are subject to a rate ranging from 16½ to 19 percent, depending upon the amount of their corporate distributions, are under my bill now subject to a flat rate of 16½ percent. There are some who say that the rate of undistributed-profits tax is now so small that it does not now have any deterrent effect upon business. But the germ is still there. If we leave it in the law, it may be increased at any time, and we will again be faced with the same situation which we were confronted with by the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1936. I believe we all realize that the undistributed-profits tax is unsound in principle and should be immediately repealed. So long as it remains a part of our law, it is a threat against new and struggling corporations as compared to those who have large accumulated surplus. Nothing could be more satisfying to business as a whole than to see this unsound tax forever stricken from our laws.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and referred, as requested by the Senator from Utah, and, without objection, will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1700) to amend the Revenue Act of 1938 and the Internal Revenue Code was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, effective as to taxable years to which they are applicable, sections 13 and 15 of the Revenue Act of 1938 and of the Internal Revenue Code are repealed.

Sec. 2. Effective as to taxable years to which they are applicable, section 14 of the Revenue Act of 1938 and section 14 of the Internal Revenue Code are amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 14. Tax on corporations. (a) Adjusted net income: For the purposes of this title, the term 'adjusted net income' means the net income minus the credit provided in section 26 (a), relating to interest on certain obligations of the United States and Government corporations.

"(b) Special class net income: For the purposes of this title the term 'special class net income' means the adjusted net income minus the credit for dividends received provided in section 26 (b).

"(c) Imposition of tax: There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the special class net income of the following corporations the tax hereinafter in this section specified.

"(d) Corporations with net incomes of not more than $25,000: If the net income of the corporation is not more than $25,000, the tax shall be as follows:

"Upon special class net income not in excess of $5,000, 12½ percent.

"$625 upon special class net incomes of $5,000, and upon special class net incomes in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $20,000, 14 percent in addition of such excess.

"$2,725 upon special class net incomes of $20,000, and upon special class net incomes in excess of $20,000, 16 percent in addition of such excess.

"(e) Corporations with net incomes of more than $25,000: If the net income of the corporation is more than $25,000, the tax shall be 16½ percent of the special class net income: Provided, however, That in no case shall the tax under this subsection exceed the sum of $3,525 plus the amount by which the special class net income exceeds $25,000."

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. TOBEY each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. 3791) to provide more effectively for the national defense by carrying out the recommendations of the President in his message of January 12, 1939, to the Congress, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

STUDY OF COMMUNICATIONS PROBLEMS

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 94), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce or a subcommittee thereof, as the committee may determine, is authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of:

1. The acts, rules, regulations, organization, and policies of the Federal Communications Commission.

2. Whether a censorship of communications has been practiced in the United States, the character and extent, and the principles which have been followed in the exercise thereof; whether the same has been exercised by the Commission, or has been influenced by other governmental departments, agencies, or officials or by licensees and against whom directed; whether broadcasting stations have been requested or influenced by the Commission or other governmental departments, agencies, or officials in any manner or degree to broadcast or to refuse to broadcast programs or parts thereof, or to permit or refuse opportunity for particular persons to broadcast; and in what circumstances, to what extent, and in what jurisdiction a broadcasting station shall be jointly or severally liable for words broadcast through its facilities, or by its officers or employees or whether stations shall be exempted from liability for words broadcast by its facilities.

3. The terms for which radio licenses for all classes of stations shall be issued and, in particular, whether a minimum length of term shall be fixed by statute for all classes of radio stations.

4. Whether a system of license fees shall be established, designed to produce sufficient revenue to meet the cost of maintenance of the Federal Communications Commission, or whether some other system of taxation for this specific purpose shall be enacted into law.

5. The extent to which and the circumstances under which the ownership, control, management, or interest in more than a single broadcasting station has become vested in any person or group of persons; whether such concentration of ownership, control, management, or interest has come about through assignment of licenses, through leases, stock ownership, arrangements with respect to management, or by other means and devices, and whether such transfers of ownership, control management, or interest in whatsoever form effected have been submitted to the Commission for approval and have received Commission approval or acquiescence; and whether such arrangements have seemed to recognize a right in a license or a frequency other than specified in the terms, conditions, and time of the license and beyond statutory limitations.

6. The extent to which broadcast stations are owned, controlled by, or are affiliated with newspapers or other publishing interests or by other media of information or entertainment, and the effect of such ownership, control, or affiliation upon competing newspapers not possessing such facilities and upon the public interest.

7. The development and present facts concerning broadcasting networks or chains, including the effects of chain association upon the licensee's control of his station; the effect of chain operations upon the financial results and status of chain-affiliated stations and of independent stations; the ability of chain owned or affiliated stations to render a local service, both sustaining and commercial; the duplication of broadcasting programs through chain broadcasting; and the desirability of special regulations governing chains and stations engaged in chain broadcasting.

8. The effects upon the broadcasting systems of the United States of the use of high power by broadcasting stations and whether there should be a limitation by statute or by regulation upon the power to be used; the experience of other countries in the use of superpower; and the effects of high power upon local stations and the service by them.

9. The character and extent of information required of licensees of broadcasting stations by the Communications Commission upon the filing of applications for construction permits, licenses, modifications or renewals of licenses, or assignments thereof or at other times.

10. Competition between communication companies in domestic service and competition between companies, both wire and radio, in communication between the United States and foreign countries; the financial results thereof to the competing companies; whether these results threaten the financial soundness of any of the companies, loss of employment, or other adverse effect upon labor; the efficiency of said companies; and, in particular, whether the merger or consolidation of communication carrier companies within the United States and in the field of foreign communications should be permitted in the public interest; and if to be permitted, the terms and conditions thereof.

11. Said committee is further authorized and directed to make a study of the policies and principles which should be declared and made effective in legislation providing for the regulation and control of communications by wire or radio, whether interstate or foreign.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and to act at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate during the Seventy-sixth Congress; to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production and impounding of such books, papers, and documents; and to administer such oaths and to take such testimony as it may deem advisable.

Upon the conclusion of its hearings and study, or from time to time during the progress thereof, the committee shall report to the Senate the results of its studies and its recommendations as to legislation it deems advisable.

THE SILVER PURCHASE PROGRAM

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I present a list of certain statements which I have made concerning the American Government's silver program, and comments on the same points which I have excerpted from testimony which the Secretary of the Treasury has given before the House Appropriations Committee and the Senate Special Silver Committee recently.

It will be noted from the Secretary's testimony that it confirms the validity of my comments with reference to silver.

I have prepared for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some of these contentions and the Secretary of the Treasury's testimony in parallel columns. In some instances it has been necessary to precede the Secretary's testimony by the questions which one Congressman or another had asked and in answer to which testimony was given. In a single instance the Treasury official quoted is not the Secretary of the Treasury, but Daniel W. Bell, Special Assistant to the Secretary.

I ask consent that this statement be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTENTIONS OF SENATOR JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR., REGARDING SILVER, AND TREASURY ADMISSIONS OF THEIR VALIDITY

Regarding unattainability of objectives of Silver Purchase Act

SENATOR TOWNSEND

SECRETARY MORGENTHAU

The technical goal of the Silver Purchase Act, after approximately 4 years of large-scale silver purchases, actually is further from attainment than it was at the time the act was passed by Congress.

(Answering question of Congressman LUDLOW regarding attainability of objects of Silver Purchase Act, namely, that "silver will ever become one-fourth of the entire monetary stock?")

I am not that much of an optimist.

(Congressman LUDLOW. Do you see any prospect that silver will ever reach $1.29 per ounce?)

No, sir. At least, not under existing conditions.

The silver subsidy, whatever its real object, is an apparent attempt at Government price fixing contrary to common sense and to economic law and against public interest. In the end, like all such experiments, it is bound to fail. Let us therefore terminate the program now.

The American Government—alone among the governments of the world—is attempting to maintain the price of silver, thus engaging in a futile gesture in defiance of economic law and foredoomed to fail.

Regarding the fact that the United States buys all silver offered, whatever the source Question. Have not the purchases of foreign silver under the American program been reduced to a mere nominal amount?

(Congressman TABER. You take all [silver] that is offered in New York, regardless of where it comes from?)

That is right.

Answer by Senator Townsend. No. During the last quarter of 1938 the United States imported $72,000,000 worth of silver, as compared with $40,000,000 worth in the corresponding quarter of 1937.

Regarding United States coinage needs

It is entirely unnecessary, undesirable, and indefensibly wasteful for this country to purchase foreign silver.

Five hundred thousand ounces of this Government's present silver holdings, * * * Senator TOWNSEND estimates, will insure an adequate supply of silver bullion until approximately the year 2039.

Regarding lack of need for more silver

Yet the astonishing fact, which betrays the greatest weakness of the silver program, is that the United States Treasury now has an additional hoard of idle silver exceeding 1,000,000,000 ounces. This is silver which is not used as a basis for silver certificates. It cost the country over half a billion dollars. Yet, since there is no need for it, and since the amount of currency already outstanding is ample for our requirements, the United States Treasury just holds that 1,000,000,000 ounces idle, while it borrows from the market to meet its daily expenses.

Regarding lack of connection between Gold Reserve Act and silver-purchase powers

Question. Does not your proposal to deprive the President of his power to revalue the silver dollar impair his corresponding power to revalue gold, as set forth in the Gold Reserve Act of 1934?

Answer (by Senator TOWNSEND). No. The gold power is completely separate from the silver power.

Regarding wide distribution to foreigners of the benefits of United States silver program

The silver program was supposed to benefit West. Yet about four-fifths of its benefits have gone to foreigners. Does that make sense?

The Government already has had to build a costly vault at West Point to hold the melted coins that a dozen foreign countries have gladly sold us for gold or other real wealth. China, Japan, Persia, Colombia, Mexico, Germany, Peru, and many other countries have melted up coin to take advantage of our unbelievably wasteful silver program. While we have supported the silver market they have sold.

For, by authority of Congress, the United States Treasury has been buying silver abroad as well as at home. It has bought silver in London, in Bombay, in Shanghai. It has purchased Canadian silver, Australian silver, Peruvian silver, Japanese silver, German silver.

Question. Apart from China and Mexico, have other foreign countries profited as a result of our silver policy?

Answer by Senator TOWNSEND. Every silver producing and selling country has profited, including Germany, which has been demonetizing silver; Italy,

SECRETARY MORGENTHAU—CON.

(Congressman LUDLOW. Mr. Secretary, we have on hand enough silver to supply many times over the coinage needs of the United States for 100 years, have we not?)

A good many years.

(Congressman LUDLOW. So there is no necessity, from that standpoint, to buy any more silver?)

No; there is not.

which called in silver coins to help finance the Ethiopian conquest; Japan; Canada; Russia; Peru; Ecuador; Australia; Spain; etc., and the London bullion market. And it must be remembered that, while China and Mexico have received enormous "gifts" from this Nation through its silver policy, the latter caused severe financial crises in China and Mexico, and unfavorable repercussions in many other countries, in 1934 and 1935. The official protests which were sent to this Government are a matter of public record, as is the critical and sarcastic editorial comment on our silver program from many parts of the world, even from the very beneficiaries of our indefensibly wasteful program.

Regarding benefit to speculators

Naturally, the speculators have profited handsomely from this "nationalization."

To the silver producers, speculators, and foreign governments who sell silver, silver certificates, or Government checks are fine.

Regarding continued buying of Mexican silver

The Treasury continues to buy Mexican silver, despite the treatment accorded to American interests by Mexico.

Question. Did not the Government cease buying Mexican silver following Mexico's increase in tariffs on imports of American goods and the seizure of American property early last year?

Answer by Senator TOWNSEND. No. The Treasury today has no agreement to buy Mexican silver from the Mexican Government or the Bank of Mexico, but it still buys newly mined Mexican silver just as much as it did before it seized American property.

Regarding Treasury's nonendorsement of the silver program

The Treasury has never endorsed the silver program and * * * the Secretary of the Treasury has stated he is opposed to all subsidies.

Regarding the loss we are taking on silver

We couldn't sell our national silver hoard at a small fraction of what we, as a nation, have paid for it.

But, quite apart from its market value now or in the future, this silver—now owned by all the people of the United States—is for the most part entirely unneeded and much of it is also actually sterile and unused. From this particular standpoint, that silver has no value to the American people, and will not have until it is sold by the Government.

* * * Mere cessation of the United States Government purchases of silver would be followed by a decline in the open market price of the metal to considerably below 43 cents per ounce. See, for example, the article of a well-known mining engineer, Mr. Percy E. Barbour, in the New York Sun of January 7, 1939.

WAR REFERENDUM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

[Mr. LEWIS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of war referenda

SECRETARY MORGENTHAU—CON.

(Senator KING. And also, some who do not produce it have speculated in silver * * * and have benefited—unfortunately?)

Yes, sir.

Since that time [March 1938] the Mexican producers have shipped their own silver into New York and have sold it there * * *.

(Congressman LUDLOW. Last year * * * you were opposed to any kind of subsidies * * *. Do you still stand on that statement?)

Yes; I still stand on that statement.

(Congressman LUDLOW. How much did that silver cost us?)

Mr. BELL. It cost us between $1,500,000,000 and $1,750,000,000.

Mr. BELL. If we could sell it at the present price, it would bring around $300,000,000 to $1,000,000,000.

delivered by Senator THOMAS of Utah on the evening of March 5, 1939, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE CHURCH AND THE STATE—ADDRESS BY BISHOP WHITEMORE

[Mr. DAVIS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject The Church and the State delivered by the Right Reverend Lewis D. Whitemore, D. D., Bishop of Western Michigan of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which appears in the Appendix.]

WISCONSIN DAIRY FARMING

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the situation of the milk farmers in my own State of Wisconsin is indeed desperate. There are a few farmers who get the benefit of the retail price. They are sitting on top of the world; but the large percentage of farmers are in a very serious condition. I desire to read a letter that came to my office this morning:

DEAR SIR: After reading your article in the Dunn County News about letters you have received from various W. P. A. workers condemning you for voting against the President's W. P. A. allotment, I felt you should know how we who are footing these huge debts feel. We are proud you voted against it, and we hope you can do something to help wipe out W. P. A. entirely. Congress has made W. P. A. so attractive that we farmers can't get help any more. Let me tell you our situation. We have a 537-acre farm in northern Dunn County and employ several men the year around. At present we have two married couples. We are paying $50 per month, with a very comfortable house for each family, 1 gallon of milk per day, all the wood they need, telephone and electric lights—they get all of this in addition to the $50 salary. The one man has found W. P. A. so attractive with only 3 days work per week, and all the things which are handed out to relief clients, that he is leaving to go on relief. We have one man in this town who holds down two W. P. A. jobs; that is, he works all 6 days, first in the Barron County lime pit and then in the Dunn County lime pit. Is this fair? It's getting so that a farmer just can't keep going with butterfat and eggs way out of sight and taxes $75 higher than last year. That is the way our farm was taxed. We have to deny ourselves and skimp on this and that to keep going while the relief people don't care what happens—they know Santa Claus will come to the rescue. We have a neighbor who has a small farm, a team of horses, five cows—just he and his wife—they are on relief, when it isn't necessary; they could live very comfortably out of their farm income.

It is very discouraging, my husband is a very good farmer, a graduate from the university where he specialized in animal husbandry, but he is just simply baffled by what will happen next. We feel as though we want to sell the entire herd, disperse with hired help, and get along as best we can. In other words, we are going backwards. Does the President prefer to have the whole United States on relief? It's beginning to look as though he is more in sympathy with the relief people than he is with the taxpayer. It looks to me as though it's getting so one-sided something will topple over one of these days.

I know you are a busy man and I probably shouldn't have written this at all, only I saw red when I read what the relief people had written to you, and I feel you should know how one of the millions of taxpayers feel.

Yours truly,

Clear Lake, Wis.

I have received many letters of similar tenor. I want to read another letter into the RECORD. It is from a small town banker:

It has been very gratifying to myself as well as your other Wisconsin friends to learn of the interest you are taking in the Wisconsin dairy farmer.

I can think of no class of people that are more worthy or in greater need of help at the present time. This county, as you may know, is largely populated by Swiss people. They are a hard-working, thrifty class of people who believe in paying their obligations 100 cents on the dollar, and it is very seldom that one of them is found working on a relief job of any kind but now for the first time they, too, are getting right up against a tough proposition.

They take the best of care of their dairy herds, many of which they have been building up for the past 50 years, but the income from milk has now gone down to a point where many of them are beginning to be very much discouraged and are beginning to wonder if it is really worth while to make the effort they have been making to pay 100 cents on the dollar and stay off of relief when they see so many others enjoying more of the good things of life than they are able to secure, and it is only a question of time when this is going to have a demoralizing effect on this thrifty class of people and I cannot help but believe the dairy farmer is entitled to more consideration than he has been receiving up to the present time.

I am also firmly in the belief that it would be good business on the part of our Government to give due consideration to the dairy industry so that an honest, hard working dairyman, willing to work from 14 to 18 hours a day at hard labor, could secure enough for his product so that he would be able to keep his family together, at least under moderate circumstances.

Only a few years ago Green County was rated as the wealthiest dairy community per capita in the United States. This has all changed within the past few years, and only very recently I saw statistics showing that the mortgages per farm on Green County farms was greater than that of any other county in the State. These people do not need the extravagant things in order to be happy and contented but it will be too bad if they are going to be allowed to become discouraged and take what might prove to be an easier way instead of going along the lines they have been following ever since they came to this country and we, ourselves, have always been proud of the manner in which they fulfilled their obligations, but I am afraid this is all going to be due for a change unless something can be done in the near future for the Wisconsin dairy farmer.

Very sincerely,

Monroe, Wis.

I have another letter from an individual, farmer and county agent:

* * * I realize that you have a true picture of the agricultural situation in Wisconsin as it is today, not so marvelous to look at, in fact, it is staring at us.

No doubt after you have painted a picture of the agricultural situation for some of the agricultural artists using a jar of paint labeled "practical experience" they may realize that the wrong kind of paint has been used in patching up the old picture.

Do I hear farmers complaining about high taxation? Yes, I do. Greater taxation with less ability to pay seems to be the set-up at present.

How little have so many of our farmers realized that after farming our farms for years and years they would become exhausted of the many necessary fertility elements for profitable production; but now the time has come that many realize this fact, that our farms have been hauled away to market in milk cans, baled hay, grain bags, also with the hazard of leaching erosion and wind.

The farmer that has watched all of the leaks of the farm over the past years and replaced that diminishing fertility has not so much to complain about; even though prices are low, he manages to get along, having the ability of purchasing power to keep the wheels of industry turning which helps to provide employment, and I guess that is what we need most.

Relief situation seems to be another large picture, and I hear it discussed from many angles. Short hours for the relief worker is contrary to the hours on the farm. Therefore it is necessary for the farmer to pay a larger salary than his income can afford to hire enough help to properly operate his farm.

I do not know of any way to shorten the hours on a dairy farm; but, until the relief worker's job is made equally as hard as the jobs on the farm, there will continue to be a lot of applications for relief, and when this change takes place I believe we will see a difference in the difficulties of relief.

Sincerely,

Eleva, Wis.

I have a number of letters that bring out this truth, that any farmer in Wisconsin today who has worked hard and accumulated a farm that 2 years ago was worth $20,000 is worse off than the man on W. P. A., because (1) the farmer has to pay taxes, insurance, and has to work 15 hours a day; and (2) he does not get as much as the W. P. A. man who works not more than twice 15 hours in a week.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the calendar, under rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 3791.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3791) to provide more effectively for the national defense by carrying out the recommendations of the President in his message of January 12, 1939, to the Congress.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I have listened to the debate on this bill for the past 8 or 9 days and have heard the greater part of it. I have also read from the printed record of the hearings consistently as they have been published. After reading these things through I have come to the conclusion that a large part of this debate has centered around the feature of our international policy. This is natural, coming from a debate upon an appropriation like this for future war, or preparation for war.

A second factor which has had a place in this debate has been the controversy over the number of planes to come out of this program.

But there is another factor which has been conspicuous by its absence, and to a large extent it appeals to me, coming from New England, where we believe that thrift and prudence are still national virtues, and I feel the rest of the country coincides with that view. I refer now to the cost of these planes. Of course, that is a factor in the consideration before us.

We are handling other people's money when we appropriate this money. My mind goes back to Justice Brandeis' famous remark about "other people's money." We should have a sense of responsibility to act as fiduciaries as we authorize this vast sum for war preparation.

As I read the hearings and the press reports I came upon one statement of General Craig's which bothered me extremely. This statement appears on page 128 of the hearings under date of January 28, and also appeared in the Washington Star of February 18. I will read the statement, if you please. The statement is:

Ours is a pretty highly paid man, and he works only a certain number of days a week and a certain number of hours a day, so that the plane which formerly cost about $50,000 has run up to over $200,000.

What the general obviously was doing, or sought to do, by that statement, was to give to the Committee on Military Affairs, and through that committee to the Senate, the impression that the great increase of 400 percent in the cost of planes was because of the increased labor factor. Such an increase seemed to me fantastic and improbable; so I wrote the general a letter as follows, and I read my letter to him:

FEBRUARY 23, 1939.

Gen. MALIN CRAIG,

Chief of Staff, War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am writing with reference to a part of your testimony before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, relative to the cost of American planes, which was carried in the Associated Press dispatches of February 18, and which reads as follows:

"Ours is a pretty highly paid man and he works only a certain number of days a week and a certain number of hours a day, so that the plane which formerly cost about $50,000 has run up to over $200,000."

This statement appears to be grounded on an understanding that a 400-percent increase in the cost of planes is totally attributable to increased cost of labor in plane manufacturing. In fairness to labor I would call your attention to the above statement which I believe to be a misrepresentation of labor's part in the cost of planes.

I would appreciate it if you would make an explanation of your understanding of the increase in wages in plane production, the part this has played in the stated 400-percent increase in the price of planes, together with the role that profit to the manufacturer has played in the same.

Would you kindly give me an early reply to this letter?

Sincerely yours,

On February 28, 5 days later, I received his reply, which I read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1939.

Hon. CHARLES W. TOBEY,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR TOBEY: A reply to your letter of February 23 has been delayed in order to check my reported testimony with the official transcript just published. As you can readily see from a perusal of page 22 of that record, the reported remarks and the recorded ones differ widely.

The only statement made was as follows: "Among the items of that [the increased cost] is the increased cost of labor, shorter number of hours, and all that sort of thing." What I was attempting to indicate was that in the greatly increased complication of the modern plane and its precision instruments, the item of labor—and it is well-paid, highly skilled labor—has increased to such an extent that it is one of the main factors of the expense of manufacture.

A computation of the labor item in the total cost of a modern bombing plane would take a great deal of research, involving as it does the break-down of the thousands of processes which go into the plane and its accessories throughout the production of the raw materials, their refinement, and intricate manufacture. The labor factor in assembling the plane is only—one phase of the problem.

Mark the word "only"—

I can assure you, however, that a simple comparison of the analogous items—and the new ones—which go into the make-up of a modern plane when considered with its predecessor will substantiate the statement that the labor involved plays an important part in the increased cost.

Cordially yours,

MALIN CRAIG, Chief of Staff.

In that letter the general absolutely refutes his original statement, which appears in the record on page 128. He entirely ignores that statement and quotes an innocuous statement made 10 days prior thereto.

So much for General Craig's letter, and my asking him for an accounting thereof. I now present to you, if you please, what General Arnold said in the hearings on House bill 3791, on page 39, in contrast to what the general and Chief of Staff have said. I quote General Arnold:

Now, we have surveyed the industry, surveyed it very carefully, and we know about what airplanes should cost us. We send auditors to all the plants that do business with us, and we can tell you how much it costs to manufacture each airplane and engine; and so we know what the airplanes should cost in the future. We can look at these records and say that a 30,000-pound airplane ought to cost so much.

Further on, on page 49, General Arnold says:

In the manufacture of airplanes we were able to take the pounds of metal that go into the airplane, the number of man-hours that go into the airplane, plus the normal overhead, and we can come pretty close to telling you what an airplane should cost.

You will note that he sounds a very positive note as to the Department's knowledge of costs; and yet General Craig, in his letter to me, said that it is impossible to determine what these things cost. Here we have a conflict of the first water between two stars of the first magnitude in the Army—one the Chief of Staff and one the head of the Aviation Bureau.

I thereupon wrote to the Bureau of Labor Statistics and received back a report which shows that in the past 4 years the average hourly earnings of labor have increased only about 15 percent. I offer the report for the RECORD. It speaks for itself.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Average weekly earnings, average hours worked per week, and average hourly earnings in the aircraft industry by years, 1932-38, inclusive

	Average weekly earnings	Average hours worked per week	Average hourly earnings
1932.....	$31.42	(1)	Cents (1)
1933.....	27.46	(1)	(1)
1934.....	24.65	39.4	63.6
1935.....	25.75	40.9	65.0
1936.....	26.07	42.1	63.1

Mr. TOBEY. On January 18, on page 22 of the hearings, General Craig makes another remarkable statement.

When asked by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]:

Do you find a substantial increase in cost in the last 2 or 3 years?

The general said:

Yes, sir. It has been only a short time since a $50,000 plane was a real plane. Now they run up as high as $300,000, $400,000, $500,000, $600,000.

I wonder why he even stopped there.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] asked him this question:

Are they very much of an improvement over the other planes?

General Craig answered:

Yes; but that has nothing to do with the increased cost of the materials.

Further, by inference, putting the cost upon labor, if you please.

Frankly, I am troubled by these figures, and question the statement of the Chief of Staff when he attributes to labor the increase of 400 percent in the cost of planes. Such an inference is unfair to labor, and is misleading to the Members of the Senate who have to consider this legislation. I am further troubled because we of the Congress, of necessity, have to look to the head of departments and the heads of the various branches of the governmental service for authoritative information on which to base our judgment as we vote on these bills; and I confess that when I run up against such discrepancies, I might almost say incongruities, I lose confidence, especially so when I call to your minds again the statement of General Craig wherein he definitely leaves the impression with us that labor is solely responsible for the increase of 400 percent in the cost of the planes.

Let me now tell you that only this morning General Arnold told me; and he is the authority to whom General Craig refers us on page 22 of the hearing, as follows:

General Arnold can give you anything you want to know as to the cost of planes.

And General Arnold told me this morning that the Army's factors in plane costs are as follows: He said it runs about 30 to 40 percent overhead, 30 to 45 percent for labor, and 30 to 35 percent for materials.

I think that is sufficient evidence to justify the charge that the inference made by General Craig in his statement is not according to the facts, and is a direct libel upon labor in this country.

Where does such testimony leave the impression which General Craig sought to impart to the committee and to the Senate?

This is the first part of the brief talk that I shall make to you, Mr. President, this morning. I now take up the second part. It is interrelated or closely related to what I have said before.

I have concluded the first part of my statement; and I now say that when this bill came out of the committee in another branch of Congress, a Member who had a large part in its shaping said to the press, "The bridle is off. Everything goes." This connotes a runaway condition in which we are doing this thing; and runaway conditions are dangerous, whether in a bill of this sort or on the public highways.

Only the other day a Member said to me in this Chamber, "There is plenty of gravy in this bill." Well, if there is, ours is the job to strain the gravy, and I propose to do it.

Many of us have grave apprehension that in such a spending program as is contemplated, there is danger of unconscionable, excessive profits. We talk much of taking profits out of war. It is of even greater importance to take excessive profits out of preparation for war, if you please. I offer to you the testimony on the floor of the Senate of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE], who spoke my mind when he said:

I do not believe it is necessary for a nation to wait until war is declared before the Government has power enough to move in, and certainly it looks like unless we do something to prevent it, we are on the verge of a rise in costs that will continue to stair-step up, and there will be no protection, and 20 years later there will be a crop of Congressmen and Senators who will come along making speeches about war profits. I would like to do something about it now.

So would I, and so, I hope, would you.

Further, the Senator from Oklahoma said, on page 50 of the hearings:

One thing that I am tremendously interested in is some method of preventing unconscionable pre-war profits. I feel certain that history will repeat itself until we do something to prevent it. When we start this program it will be a signal for a big killing in profits, and I would be glad if your Department could help us in some way—your War College has made a study of such things, I believe—offering suggestions along the line that would suggest to us legislation to prevent the war profits leading up to the war. That might never happen, of course, but then when we start increasing our national defense, that is enough to begin an era of unreasonable profits.

In 1934 an investigation was made by the House Committee on Naval Affairs of profits in aviation. That was the last investigation made into those profits. It showed an unconscionable profit on the part of some of the larger aircraft concerns in this country, and I point out that the aircraft industry in this country is largely centralized in three or four large concerns, two in particular. They are great holding companies. They have great ramifications, many individual concerns underneath them. The testimony as brought out by Mr. DELANEY, of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, in the 1934 hearings, revealed the fact that what has happened all through the years has been that these individual companies have made enormous profits year after year, but when they become a part of the holding company, the fountain head, the profits disappear and losses are charged up to them, because they have been packed from the top down, loaded up with supercharges, killing the real picture of the profit end of the business.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. LEE. The Senator is very kind in his reference to a question which I asked in the committee. I merely wanted him to show in the RECORD at this point that some very able Members of this body conducted munitions hearings—the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE]. They reported a bill, as the result of the investigation, and I believe that if we should pass that bill we would recover most of the profits which result from war, at which I was driving in my question, and I am persuaded it would result in the recovery of some of the profits leading up to war. I merely wanted to say, in connection with the Senator's remarks, that I hoped we can consider such a measure at this session.

Mr. TOBEY. I thank the Senator, and I wish to say, in tribute to the committee, that there is no man in the Congress who holds the committee in higher esteem than I. I perused its report all through, every part of it, and I say that there is dynamite in that report. There is in it an indictment of the Congress of the United States, in the minds of thoughtful people, which has never come to light.

I now turn to the matter of profits. I call attention to the year 1934, the last one for which we have available figures, and I wish to put in the RECORD a statement of the profits, as produced in the hearings of the House Committee on Naval Affairs in 1934.

There are two large concerns which make all the large airplane engines, one the Wright, the other the United Aircraft Corporation, which embodied the Pratt & Whitney Corporation.

In 1927 their sales amounted to $1,204,060, the cost of those planes was $908,000, giving round figures, and the profit was $295,000, or 40 percent.

In 1928 sales amounted to $5,013,000, the cost was $3,535,000, the profit was $1,478,000, or 40 percent.

In 1929 and 1930 the sales amounted to $9,851,000, the cost $6,588,000, the profit $3,262,000, or 50 percent.

In 1931 the sales amounted to $729,000, the cost was $557,000, the profit was $172,000, or 31 percent.

In 1932 the sales amounted to $2,273,000, the cost was $1,894,000, the profit was $378,000, or 20 percent.

In 1933 the sales amounted to $2,227,000, the cost was $2,078,000 the profit was $149,000, or 7 percent.

I point out that that was the year in which it became evident to this aircraft concern that the House Committee on Naval Affairs was about to make an investigation. I think there is some connection between the drop to 7 percent and the imminence of the investigation.

I now turn to the Army planes. In 1927 the sales amounted to $326,000, the cost was $188,000, the profit was $138,000, or 73 percent.

In 1928 the sales amounted to $220,000, the cost was $148,000, the profit was $71,000, or 48 percent.

In 1930 the sales amounted to $3,300,000, the cost was $2,600,000, the profit was $657,000, or 25 percent.

In 1931 the sales amounted to $4,364,000, the cost was $3,558,000, the profit was $806,000, or 23 percent.

In 1932 the sales amounted to $2,738,000, the cost was $2,206,000, the profit was $532,000, or 25 percent.

In 1933 the sales amounted to $1,141,000, the cost was $1,061,000, the profit was $79,000, or 7 percent. Again it dropped to the low figure of 7 percent because—and there is no question about this at all—they knew the investigation was coming.

Now, I wish to read the testimony of C. W. Browning, chief accountant of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of the Navy Department, when he was interrogated by Mr. McFarlane, of the House Committee on Naval Affairs:

Mr. MCFARLANE. What is the percentage of profit?

Mr. BROWNING. The percentage of profit was 36 percent.

Mr. MCFARLANE. Let us get down to the Army purchases made and give us the same information for the same company by years.

Mr. BROWNING. The statement shows that in 1927-28—the report was consolidated—the sales were $546,925, the cost was $337,702, and the profit was $209,223.

Mr. MCFARLANE. What percentage of profit is that, Mr. Browning?

Mr. BROWNING. I will have to figure the percentage out. The percentage on the Hornets is—

That is, the Hornet engine—

The percentage on the Hornets is 73 percent and on the Wasps 48 percent.

Mr. DELANEY. Seventy-three percent profit was made on contracts with the Army?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes, sir.

Let me now bring attention to a matter which I think has escaped the attention of most Members of Congress. It has to do with sales of aircraft to the Navy, a branch of the Government, by one aircraft concern whose stock is still listed on the New York Stock Exchange, a stock in which they make great profits. Under questioning by Mr. DELANEY, of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. Reuben H. Fleet, president of the Consolidated Aircraft Corporation, testified as follows:

In 1927 our total sales to the United States Navy were $564,503.63.

Mr. DELANEY. What profit did you make on that?

Mr. FLEET. We made 49½ percent. * * * In 1928 we did with the United States Navy $1,295,722.39 worth of business. * * * The profit made was 34.8 percent. In 1929 we did $934,000 worth of business and we made 16.4 percent. * * * In 1931 we did $40,000 worth of business and made 29 percent.

This was the concern which made such unconscionable profits on contracts with this Government that the Government intervened, through its Government attorneys, and was going to put someone in jail, but to forestall that dire consequence it sold to the Government 50 airplanes at a dollar bill apiece, $50 for 50 airplanes identical in kind and value with those for which the Government had paid $6,000 apiece. It diluted the profits in order to save prosecution by the Government.

I now give a picture of an instance of profit accruing, not to the concerns themselves, but to officials of the concerns, and I go back to the time of the United Aircraft and Transport Corporation, when C. W. Deeds, son of E. A. Deeds, chairman of the executive committee, was summoned to appear before the subcommittee. In 1926 this man purchased at 20 cents a share 200 shares of Pratt & Whitney stock, for which he paid the total sum of $40. Later he exchanged these shares for 16,000 shares of the Pratt & Whitney Co. and 35,000 shares of the United Aircraft and Transport Corporation at the high-water mark of the stock on the stock exchange in these securities. In 1929 his $40 investment had grown to $5,626,640.

It is "gravy" like that which makes some of us troubled when we get a program of this sort.

Now we have the testimony of Mr. Guy Warner Vaughan, president of the Wright Aeronautics Corporation. He said:

The percentage of profit in 1927 was 29.5 percent. * * * This is strictly Navy. * * * In 1928 the percentage of profit was 44.1, and in 1929 the percentage of profit was 30.6 percent.

Mr. DELANEY. How do you secure your contracts?

Mr. VAUGHAN. By negotiation.

Mr. DELANEY. I mean, is it on open bidding?

Mr. VAUGHAN. No, sir.

I now call attention to the make-up of some of the concerns. I am concerned about this, and I want to state definitely that I am not opposed to the profit system. There is no man in this country who believes it is more sound or wants it perpetuated more than I do, but when we are dealing with other people's money, when we are dealing with the taxpayer's money—he is the forgotten man—every Member of this body is a fiduciary to look out for his interests when we vote on these bills, and that is why I am speaking this morning.

I now wish to give a picture of the make-up of these aircraft corporations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Are the corporations to which the Senator has referred still dealing with the Government, and is the Government still buying airplanes from the same corporations?

Mr. TOBEY. Yes; very definitely. In fact, the major part of their work is Government work at the present time.

Mr. KING. Has not the Government adopted some policy punitive in character?

Mr. TOBEY. I shall come to that a little bit later.

Going back to the picture I wish to present of the capital structure of these corporations. I now quote from Poor's Manual of 1938:

UNITED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION

History and business: Incorporated July 21, 1934, in Delaware to acquire pursuant to plan of reorganization of United Aircraft & Transport Corporation and from said corporation all of the outstanding stock of Chance Vought Corporation, Hamilton Standard Propeller Co., the Hamilton Standard Propeller Corporation, Northrop Aircraft Corporation, the Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Co., United Aircraft Exports, Inc., and the United Airports of Connecticut, Inc., and all of the outstanding stock owned by United Aircraft & Transport Corporation of Sikorsky Aviation Corporation. In consideration for the stocks of such companies and other assets (about 51 percent) acquired from United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, together with United Air Lines Transport Corporation and Boeing Airplane Co. (the three new corporations formed under plan of reorganization of United Aircraft & Transport Corporation), jointly and severally assumed and/or guaranteed all of the liabilities, known or unknown, of United Aircraft & Transport Corporation (of Delaware) and the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation (of Connecticut).

I now go back to Poor's Manual of 1933 and read the portfolio, so to speak, of this aircraft corporation, which is now taken into the parent company.

Boeing Airplane Co. (Its planes are standard for the Army and Navy.)

Hamilton Standard Propeller Corporation.

Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Corporation. (Largest engine company in the world.)

Sikorsky Aviation Co., Bridgeport. (Navy planes.)

Stearman Aircraft Co. (Sport planes.)

Chance Vought Corporation. (Corsair planes for Navy.)

Western Air Express, 47½ percent.
General Aviation Manufacturing Co.

(NOTE.—Forty-three percent of North American Aviation is owned by General Aviation Corporation, 50 percent of which is owned by General Motors.)

Mr. DELANEY, in speaking of holding companies, said:

All of these facts that we have secured in the last 3 weeks before this committee indicate one thing, and that is that as soon as the holding companies or these financiers take these businesses they manipulate the books and immediately in some way or other—perhaps for the purpose of evading taxes—they show a loss. That has been demonstrated right through this hearing.

A company may be going along very nicely and being successful when these holding companies acquire the stock, and immediately the business has a loss, or at least they show no profit.

Mr. President, replying in a way to the interrogation of the Senator from Utah, I now propose to the Senate the nub of my address this morning. I propose to do something in connection with this thing, and I hope the Senate will do something about it. I propose to offer in the Senate at the proper time, after committee amendments are out of the way, an amendment, and the amendment I shall offer is merely this, that we shall limit the profits to not more than 10 percent.

To some of the Senators there may seem to be something novel about it. I give you the history of this amendment. In 1934, when the Vinson naval bill was under discussion on the floor of the House of Representatives, it was amended to limit all profit thereafter to 10 percent. The Vinson-Trammell Naval Act of 1934 was no more of a specific bill than this. It had no amount in it. The amendment was carried, over certain opposition, by a tremendous majority. It came to the Senate, and to the everlasting credit of the Senator from Florida, Mr. Trammell, the Senator from Kansas, Mr. McGill, and the Senator from Washington Mr. Bone, who is now with us, they got behind it and the Senate adopted the amendment in 1934. At that time it was opposed very vigorously, still it went through. But since 1934 it has been accepted by the Congress with satisfaction, for in 1936 it was made a part of the great naval appropriation bill, and in 1937 it was made a part of the appropriation bill, and again in 1938 it was in an integral part of the super naval bill that passed in May. And it was so well regarded that the Senate put the same legislation in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. If that is good for naval and other procurements, it is good for the Army.

Let me tell the Senate what that amendment provides. It provides that no concern shall be awarded a contract of $10,000 or over unless he agrees—

To pay into the Treasury "profit, as hereinafter provided shall be determined by the Treasury Department in excess of 10 percent of the total contract price, such amount to become the property of the United States: Provided, That if such amount is not voluntarily paid the Secretary of the Treasury may collect the same under the usual methods employed under the internal-revenue laws, to collect Federal income taxes."

I may say that law was amended in 1935 or 1936, so that scientific instruments, such as navigation devices and devices used in target practice, were exempted from its provisions.

At the time that amendment was adopted they inserted a new clause providing that losses made in one year may be offset against profits made in another year. That is a part of the law. That is, very briefly, the amendment I propose to offer at the appropriate time today.

I bring to the attention of the committee a discussion of General Arnold's testimony appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1939, when the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] was speaking. He said:

That point was pretty well discussed in the hearings. I shall not read what was said, but I call the Senator's attention to pages 54 and 55, where General Arnold definitely stated that the War Department knew to the fraction of a percent the profits made in each airplane factory to which they let contracts. He also suggested that it might be possible that legislation later would be helpful in limiting or putting a ceiling on those profits, and I am sure we should find no disagreement in this body to doing that.

On page 50 of the hearings of the Military Affairs Committee, Tuesday, January 24, 1939, we find this statement by General Arnold:

At this writing, Mr. Senator, we know the profits that every company makes that is connected in any way primarily with airplane contracts. For instance, last year the average profit made by all the airplane companies was 10.8 percent. The average profit on engines was 9.1 percent. The average profit on accessories was 24.2 percent. We have auditors in all those plants. With that background, we can come pretty close to telling when anybody bids on a contract how much the airplanes should cost.

Senators, note this statement:

That, coupled with a bill to limit profits to 10 percent, should do the trick.

That is expert testimony. It is up our alley. General Arnold asks for this 10-percent limitation amendment.

I shall quote from the report of the Committee on Military Affairs dealing with national defense, page 2:

The President then proposed that, of the $450,000,000 to be allocated for new needs of the Army, the sum of $300,000,000 be appropriated for the purchase of additional airplanes; that this appropriation of $300,000,000 should provide a minimum increase of 3,000 planes, with the hope that orders placed on such a large scale would reduce materially the unit cost and provide actually many more planes.

I share that hope. It is commendable. So do we all. But I am doubtful of its working, and I will tell the Senate why. I now bring to the Senate's attention the testimony of Admiral Robinson given before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, in which he said:

The committee finds, under the heading "Prices increased with big Navy," that the need of the Navy for many ships in 1933 was the main cause for the increase in prices charged by the private shipbuilders, and that they frankly admitted this, and that the Navy recognized the fact.

That is a contradiction of the President's hope, and the question was put to Admiral Robinson:

They (the shipbuilders) were frank enough to say they were putting up prices because of the great amount of work at the time?

And Admiral Robinson said in answer to that question:

There is no question about that.

So that the President's hope is not well founded, and history proves, by this testimony I have just given you, that when large orders come in for a large number of things, whether ships, aircraft, or munitions, the prices go up accordingly, and the Government is charged accordingly, and that means the taxpayers have to pay increased amounts.

I go on to the possibility of collusion. The committee further finds that Navy officials have been transmitting to congressional committees figures on comparative costs of private and navy yards, showing the profits on a private-built ship, the cruiser Chester, as $983,000, whereas the New York Shipbuilding Corporation informed the Munitions Committee that its profit on the cruiser was $2,946,706.

Here we have a situation that makes me a little bit troubled with General Arnold's testimony, for whereas he says he knows what it is going to be, history does not confirm that fact, for a few years ago, when the discussion was going on with respect to the Vinson bill, it was reported by the Navy that the profits on the private-built ship the Chester were $983,000, but the Senate committee uncovered a profit of $2,946,000, or nearly $2,000,000 more than the Navy officials showed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is making a very admirable address, and bringing to the attention of the Senate what I think a very important matter. The last quotation that the Senator made referred to a question that has been in my mind, and that is whether or not the Senator's amendment—and I shall support the amendment—will really do what the Senator seeks to have done; whether or not a 10-percent limitation will be effective, having in mind, as we know, that costs can be juggled all kinds of ways. We recall that during the World War we did most of our building and construction under a cost-plus system, and we know the tremendous padding that went into cost items during that period. Now, we are starting out here with a great building program, and I am wondering whether or not we can really reach the things that ought to be reached, and that the Senator has so forcibly brought to our attention, simply by writing into the bill the 10-percent limitation provision.

Mr. TOBEY. I share the Senator's views, and I have tried to educate myself on that point. I will reply to the Senator as follows: I do not know whether the amendment will be sufficient to do away with the danger which the Senator and I both feel exists, but I will say that a similar amendment of the Naval Act has been in force since 1934. While some will say it has not done very much, up to a month ago approximately $2,000,000 has been turned back to the Treasury of this country under the amendment to the Vinson-Trammell Naval Act.

The Senator has touched upon a very weak spot in this whole situation. The committee of the Senate, whose chairman was the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye], brought out in the testimony what I uncovered by a little private research—that the abominable part of this whole thing is that these shipbuilding companies—and I am inclined to believe that it will be true of aircraft-manufacturing corporations also—do the unjust thing, the dishonest thing, in padding the costs.

In building a ship to obviate the necessity of staying within the limitation of 10-percent profit in manufacture, they will take a contract for putting in a crane that might cost $73,000, and charge that up, not as a permanent improvement of the yard but to the cost of that particular job. That is not our responsibility in the immediate sense; it is in the last sense. That responsibility is on the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department. Just as a wholly personal remark I say that I am going to see that the responsibility is lived up to if I have any part in the action taken in the Senate from this time forth.

We are doing the best we can. Line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, we are building up a defense mechanism to guard the people of the country against the miserable chicanery that has been going on all too long.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I wish to say, as I indicated in the beginning, that I think the Senator's amendment ought to be adopted. It is surely a step in the right direction. However, as the Senator himself has indicated, there is very serious question as to just how effective the amendment would be and whether or not the amendment would do the job as it ought to be done.

In that connection I was very much interested in the statement made on Friday by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] in a query addressed to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark]. As we recall, the Senator from Missouri was a member of the Senate Munitions Committee, on which committee he served with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye]. The Senator from Missouri, of course, saw the whole sordid picture which the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire has depicted for us.

The Senator from Nebraska said:

The Senator speaks of a combination to increase prices. As a result of our past experience, his remarks appeal to me very much. Has the Senator given any thought to the idea of regulating the price and avoiding a combination which might unduly increase the price by including, either in this bill or some other bill, an appropriation which would provide for a Government manufacturing plant by which the Government itself could engage in the airplane business if it wanted to do so?

I should like to ask the Senator a question with regard to the query of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. In that connection I should like to add a word, if I may do so without taking too much of the time of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. I attended a meeting of the Senate Commerce Committee during the last session of Congress, when the United States Maritime Commission came before the Senate Commerce Committee with the suggestion, if not the request, that the Maritime Commission, representing the Government and the people of the United States, be permitted to go to foreign countries to have American ships built. The Commission was forced to come before the Senate Commerce Committee with such a request or suggestion because American shipbuilders were not willing to build American ships for the American Government and the American people without all kinds of outrageous costs and prices being demanded for the work.

On the other hand, the Navy has not been forced to do that, and has not done so, because the Navy has its navy yards where the Government can and does build ships. Because the Government is able to, and does build some of its own ships in its own yards, the Navy Department has been able to obtain fair prices from the private shipbuilding companies in this country. So I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire how he feels about the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] that it may be wise for us to establish a Government plant to manufacture airplanes, so as to give us a yardstick by which we can measure the fair cost and a fair price for such airplanes.

Mr. TOBEY. I am very glad to answer that inquiry. I again refer to the Vinson-Trammell Act of 1934. When the bill was under consideration in the House of Representatives, and specifically touching upon the Senator's point, Chester Thompson, then a Member of the House from Rock Island, Ill., took the floor and offered the Thompson amendment to the Vinson-Trammell bill. I supported the Thompson amendment with great pleasure.

The Thompson amendment decrees that every other ship in naval construction must be built in Government yards. Specifically touching upon the question whether or not I think it is wise, I say that in a matter of such great importance, with a record so unsavory, as I have said, I believe it might be advisable for the Government to have sufficient plants of its own to build at least half the airplanes needed, as a check and balance on private industry to keep the profit within reason. As a measuring stick, personally I should approve such a plan.

The Senator has touched upon the padding of the construction accounts and the difficulty of eliminating such practices. The difficulty has been present throughout the consideration of all the different bills.

The Nye committee, in its great report, brings out instance after instance in which such practices have been followed. The most striking feature of the report along that line was the fact that at the time the Vinson-Trammell bill was held before us as an opportunity for business one Mr. Bardo, who has now passed to the Great Beyond and who was formerly president of the National Manufacturers' Association and later president of the New York Shipbuilding Co., came to Washington and conferred with the Navy Department. Two weeks before the bids were opened he wrote back to three shipbuilding concerns, including the one with which he was connected, telling them just what they would receive as a result of the bids for ships, the number of ships, and the amount, to the dollar. When the bids were opened the companies were awarded just what he had stated to the cent and to the ship. How in God's world could that come about except by collusion between men in the Navy Department and Mr. Bardo? In my judgment, Mr. Bardo was a man of unsavory reputation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOBEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was also brought out before the Munitions Committee, in a very similar incident to the one to which the Senator has just referred, and in the case of a company of which Mr. Bardo was president at that time along with two other companies, that the president of a company which desired to be a bidder for the construction of certain naval vessels felt that the circumstances were such that he did not think he could be a bidder because of collusion. Ten days before the bids were even received, in the office of Mr. John P. Fry, the head of the metal trades department of the American Federation of Labor this man put in an envelope a summary of what the bids would be and what the awards would be; which ships the New York

Shipbuilding Co. would be awarded, which ships the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co. would be awarded, and which ships the Newport News Co. would be awarded, and pointing out the system of collusive bidding by which each company, a party to the agreement, would protect the other companies in the awards designed for them. Mr. Fry himself, and also his assistant, testified to seeing Mr. Wilder put the figures on a sheet of paper, that Mr. Fry sealed them up in an envelope and put them in his safe. After the awards were made Mr. Fry opened the envelope; and Mr. Wilder had called the turn, 2 weeks in advance, upon every award made by the Government of the United States.

Mr. TOBEY. I thank the Senator from Missouri for his contribution. He was a great part of that committee. I followed with interest all the testimony, particularly his questions. They went right to the point.

The cardinal sin in this country is not immorality in any of its forms. It is apathy and indifference. It is an amazing thing to me that the American people have not risen up and cried, "Unclean! Unclean!"

Let me go further in connection with the investigation under discussion and point out a few instances, without mentioning names. This is not the place to mention names. I point out three or four bits of testimony which show the depths of degradation to which some men went in that connection.

A Member of Congress at that time wrote a letter to one of the shipbuilding companies, in which he said:

As you perhaps know, a Congressman must derive some of his income from other sources than being a Member of the House, and in this case I would like to bring to your attention the fact that my secretary and myself have a company in Philadelphia, trading under the name of So-and-So.

This man was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House.

In this company we have the representation of the So-and-So Manufacturing Co. There are only four manufacturers in this particular line in the country and our company is one of them. I am writing you particularly at this time to ask if it would be possible for you to add our name to your inquiry list for materials in connection with the ships you are about to build. We can sell the material direct or can quote on an applied basis.

We have performed work for companies such as New York Ship with whom you are acquainted, Newport News, and for the Government direct on repair jobs.

I will appreciate your interest.

So much for that testimony. Let me go further than that. We now come to a case in which a gentleman wrote about his son. His son was in the insurance business, and the gentleman in question was in a high position in the Government. He demanded that part of the insurance of these concerns be credited to his son's account. In the correspondence on this subject between the representatives of one of the shipbuilding companies we find the following:

His son, So-and-So, is in the insurance business * * *. I have asked him to call on you and you will have to help him to a slice of our business somewhere or other. Be as nice to him as you can and talk to me about it after you have talked to him.

The reply stated:

I have your letter about So-and-So, and, of course, I will be nice to him and would like to send him away satisfied as well as pleased. The pleased part will be more easy though than the satisfied part.

Time went on. He did not get the insurance.

Then we find the following communication:

Mr. So-and-So came in yesterday and we had a very pleasant visit. I explained to him that you had told me that somewhere or somehow some business would have to be turned over to him because his father had been so helpful. I told him just about what insurance we were carrying and he saw that there was very little there that could be put through his office.

Three days later, in response to the last letter, we find the following:

Answering your letter of the 26th, you have got to do something for young So-and-So, so make the best of it.

So, young Mr. So-and-So was taken care of.

The damndest part—and I say "damndest" advisedly, Mr. President, for I am not a profane man; but such things ought to be damned—is that the Washington representative of a great concern in this country which was selling things to the Navy Department wrote to the president of that concern, at the home office of that company, a letter to the effect that he had succeeded in getting two Members of the House on the Rules Committee of the House. He said that "the Rules Committee is the most important committee in Congress; absolutely controls legislation." He was trying to curry favor, evidently on the theory that gratitude is the expectation of favors yet to come. He could see an enlarged salary check and perhaps a bonus for the next year.

Shame on the American people! There is something the matter with us today. Are there any strings on us? Are we still free men? If so, we should cry out, "Unclean! Unclean!" and determine that so far as lies within our power we will put the bars up against a repetition or recurrence of such practices.

In conclusion, Mr. President, it is not only CHARLES TOBEY, of New Hampshire, who makes this plea. It is not only General Arnold, the head of the Air Service of the War Department, who asks for a 10-percent profit limitation. But I now quote the words of Admiral Peoples, who, I believe, officially is Chief of the Bureau of Procurement, when he was testifying before the House committee on the 1936 Navy appropriation bill. In speaking of this 10-percent limitation, Admiral Peoples said, in answer to a question, and I quote from the record:

I might add, too, Mr. Chairman, that I think that that is one of the best laws put on the statute books, and I think it ought to apply not only to the Navy but to other departments of the Government, the War Department particularly.

In conclusion, and finally, Mr. President, our job is to be eternally vigilant. Vigilance is still the price of taking care of the taxpayers' money, and vigilance, Senators, demands that we follow this thing through. I am not satisfied, and the other Members of the Senate should not be satisfied, to pass this bill without a 10-percent limitation for tomorrow, the day after tomorrow, next year, and the year after that. We should use the powers the Senate has and apply to the Army, and the Navy, so as to be advised of what is going on—to learn what is being done and whether the charges are true. Let us get the truth, and the truth shall make the American people free.

At the proper time, after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of, I shall offer my amendment to limit the profits under contracts made in pursuance of this bill to 10 percent.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOBEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. I take it the Senator not only desires to have a 10-percent limit but to have it include all profits that might slip through after every safeguard we can think of has been applied. I take it the Senator then will support the bill that a number of us are shortly introducing to apply, by the tax method, a fine-tooth comb to the profits made out of preparations for war and activities during war.

Mr. TOBEY. Does the Senator refer to the bill the Senator from Washington is about to introduce?

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY. I have authorized the Senator to attach my name to the bill. I did so with pleasure and also with alacrity.

Mr. LEE. Very good.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I agree very heartily with what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] has said, and I am strongly in favor of the amendment he is about to propose to limit the profits on the airplanes to be purchased. Much has been said with regard to the hearings that have been held before the committee on the pending airplane bill. I desire to call attention to a few statements made in the hearings.

I was much interested in what the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said on Friday in regard to the hearings. On page 17 of the hearings General Craig made the statement:

If I may have the permission of the Chair, I ask for the same privilege extended to Secretary Woodring in order that I may present these facts logically.

He seems to have emphasized the fact that he desired, in the statement he was making, to present the facts "logically." He goes forward and sets forth amounts of appropriations for several items, such as the increase in the permanent Coast Artillery garrison in the Panama Canal Zone, for educational orders, for flying schools, for the National Guard, and so forth. Then on page 18 he suggests $300,000,000 for airplanes.

Then he sets up a break-down showing how this money is to be expended. I find on page 22 General Craig also made a statement with regard to the cost of airplanes, a subject to which the Senator from New Hampshire referred very briefly. General Craig said:

It has been only a short time since a $50,000 plane was a real plane. Now they run up as high as $300,000, $400,000, $500,000, $600,000.

In the general break-down on page 18 General Craig suggests certain figures. The objective of the bill, he says, of the 5,500-plane program, is 3,300 combat planes; miscellaneous planes, 127; training planes, 2,073. That makes the full number. He says that they have on hand 1,707 combat planes, 113 miscellaneous planes, 648 training planes. In order to bring the number up to 5,500, 3,032 more planes are required, which will be made up, according to the general, of 1,593 combat planes, 14 miscellaneous planes, and 1,425 training planes, making a total of 3,032, or a total with what they have on hand of 5,500.

He states that when this program is completed they will have in operation 1,965 combat planes and a reserve of 1,335 combat planes; in the miscellaneous division they will have 119 in operation and 8 in reserve; and of training planes, 1,253 in operation and 820 in reserve; making a total in operation of 3,337 and a total reserve of 2,163, making a grand total of 5,500.

In his break-down he says on page 18 of the hearings:

For aviation we propose to expend $170,000,000 for 3,032 planes.

The Senator from Missouri made the very emphatic statement that there was no definite amount set forth in this bill to be appropriated for carrying out its purposes; that only the number of planes was to be determined and not the amount of the expenditure. However, General Craig says that "we propose to expend $170,000,000 for 3,032 planes."

Under the break-down that is the total number of new planes that must be built to carry out this program.

One hundred and seventy million dollars for 3,032 planes would be an average of a little more than $56,000 per plane, although on page 22 General Craig, referring to the increase in the price of the planes, says that $50,000 used to build a real plane, but he says, "Now they run up as high as $300,000, $400,000, $500,000, or $600,000."

He seems to advocate purchases at such figures. According to the Senator from Missouri, that was not his purpose, but apparently the statement was made—or at least that is the way it seems to me—to mislead those who read the hearings.

He says:

We propose to expend $170,000,000 for 3,032 planes.

I was very much interested in the statement of the Senator from Missouri on Friday that no limit was provided on the appropriation. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if this program is carried out, a great deal more than $300,000,000 will be necessary—probably several times $300,000,000.

Of course, there is a great deal said about the necessity for these planes, but there is a difference of opinion as to that. Many of the training planes, as they are called, are simply playthings or toys for those who use them, and, of course, a great many fatal accidents occur in these plaything airplanes.

I have a little clipping from the Washington Star of March 1 of this year entitled "Britain To Give 1,200,000 Babies 'Toy' Gas Masks." If we are to build these toys for the airplane service with which to practice, why not give the babies gas masks to play with, too? That is what is being done in Great Britain; 1,200,000 such masks are being given away there. The Associated Press dispatch to which I refer has a London date line of March 1, and reads:

Britain's air raid precautions organization today prepared for distribution of 1,200,000 free gas helmet "toys" to British infants as wartime precaution against gas attacks.

The organization's headquarters said distribution would start in 3 weeks and urged that parents teach their babies to treat the helmets as toys until they reach the age of 2.

I hope some of them will be provided for the babies in the region from which the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania originally came, and that those babies will be permitted to play with them for a couple of years before they become big enough to use real gas masks or may have to use them.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, did the Senator see the front-page picture of the publication Look about 2 weeks ago?

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not recall to what the Senator refers.

Mr. DAVIS. It was a very fine picture of the gas mask upon a child. I am sure the Senator would be interested in it.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether gas masks will be available for Senators. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not know. They might become necessary, but whether they would be used as toys or for real protection is another question.

This article goes on:

With mica fronts, the helmets are made to fit snugly over babies' heads during the time their parents would be rushing them to air-raid refuges in case of air attack.

A bellows attachment would supply air to the wearer. Experts were said to have tried them on 300 babies without injurious effects.

So they are tried out and perfected; and the babies, at least 1,200,000 of them, in Great Britain are to be furnished with these toy gas masks.

Mr. President, it seems an awful situation when any civilized country on the face of the earth, after over 1,900 years of Christian teachings, should feel forced to buy gas masks for babies under 2 years of age. I sometimes wonder what the world is coming to. If we think we are liable to be attacked by the air forces from some other country, it may be necessary that we provide gas masks for the babies of the country.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the Senator familiar with what is going on today in Great Britain—that apartments are being built for people to live in under the ground, so that they may go there for shelter from airplane raids?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes, Mr. President. A year ago, when we had before us an appropriation for War and Navy purposes, I read a little leaflet that a friend of mine had given me that he received from a cousin of his living in London describing how gas-proof chambers should be built and advocating that they be built in every home in London to protect their people. I read that leaflet into the Record, and it is available if anyone wants to look it up.

I have before me a copy of a petition that was sent to the President and the Congress of the United States. It is signed by some 260 or 270 persons, most of them from New Jersey and New York. I want to read two or three extracts from it.

The signers of the petition start in by talking about general preparation for war, what has been said about it, and the preparations that are advocated, and say:

Are there any foreign threats against our right to practice democracy?

They ask that question.

Are the dictatorship countries trying to impose by force of arms their dictatorship systems upon us?

Personally, Mr. President, I have not heard of any such thing; but some of those who have spoken in favor of great airplane preparation seem to indicate that we are in danger of losing our democracy, and of being attacked by foreign forces.

The petition goes on:

Is any foreign nation threatening us, or any other nation of the Western Hemisphere, with economic sanctions or military aggression? For 216 years we have, without war, enforced the Monroe Doctrine. As to sanctions, is not the boot on the other foot? Are not we the ones who are threatening others with economic sanctions or boycotts? There is an unofficial, but widespread boycott of German goods, and prominent Americans are openly promoting a boycott of Japanese goods.

Economic sanctions are a delusion and a snare. They are more likely to be provocative of war than to secure peace and advance civilization. As was demonstrated in the case of Ethiopia, economic sanctions can be enforced only by a universal league of nations, backed by an overwhelming international force. The United States has always been unwilling to join in any league to police the world. In this respect we have so far wisely abided by the warnings of Washington and Jefferson.

The fallacious idea that we cannot keep out of another European war has been fostered by nations which would naturally want us to take an active part on their side should another war come. There are nations who would like us as allies in a war, but none who would voluntarily add us to their enemies.

Mr. President, I think those paragraphs are very apt on the present occasion.

Much has been said about keeping treaties, and criticisms have been made of the action of other nations in breaking treaties. We have, of course, had some occasion to criticize other nations. I think the United States perhaps is also subject to criticism.

Mention was made a few days ago on the floor of the Senate of the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact, which was adopted 10 years ago on the 15th day of last January. I want to read that pact, because some persons seem to think it does not amount to anything. A Senator on the floor of the Senate a few days ago said it was just a joke. It may be a joke, but it is a part of the law of the land. It was adopted by the Congress and adopted by other nations.

Article I of that treaty provides:

The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the name of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

ART. II. The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means.

That is the end of the article.

Mr. President, when that peace treaty was ratified by the Senate some of us thought it meant what it said.

Under the Constitution of the United States treaties which we duly adopt become a part of the supreme law of the land.

This treaty was adopted almost unanimously. Only one vote was recorded against it in the Senate. The United States and 61 other nations solemnly went on record renouncing aggressive warfare.

Surely if all these nations, including our own, had lived up to this treaty, there would have been no war or threat of war at the present time; there would have been no necessity for increased appropriations for armaments, not even for so-called adequate defense, because if there were no more aggressive warfare, we most certainly would not have needed additional armaments, including immense battle-ships, even for defense. If this treaty were lived up to, no defense would be necessary. We would have world peace.

To many of us who hoped that the treaty meant what it said, and that it really was a move toward world peace, it was a decided disappointment when appropriations for the Army and Navy came before the Senate, shortly after the peace treaty was adopted, amounting to over $678,000,000 for the ensuing year. This was an increase of approximately fifty-three and a half million dollars over the previous year, and since that time the appropriations for the Army and Navy have continued to increase, with the exception of the fiscal years 1933 and 1934, when they went down slightly.

In 1937 we went over the billion-dollar mark. The peace treaty was ignored. The argument was made that we were the richest nation in the world and should have the biggest navy and the biggest air force and the largest standing army.

The 1938 appropriations were still higher, and now the estimated amount for the Army and the Navy for the coming fiscal year is almost one and a half billion dollars.

The appropriations for the War and Navy Departments during the past 5 years, including the estimated amount for the present Congress, are the largest by far of any peacetime appropriations for war. The 6-year appropriations total $6,107,674,991, averaging over a billion dollars a year, and this for war purposes in peacetime.

Was the Kellogg Peace Treaty just a meaningless gesture, or was the treaty renouncing war just a worthless scrap of paper—just a joke, as one of the Senators characterized it the other day on the floor of the Senate? It would almost seem as if that is what it was; but let us remember, Mr. President, that the United States was the leader, with France, in securing the adoption of this peace treaty.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FRAZIER. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand, there has not been any declaration of war between the warring countries. Was there a declaration of war by Japan against China or by China against Japan?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; there has been no declaration of war, but they have war just the same. Just a few nights ago I heard an address by a young lady who had spent some time in the Orient, and she vividly pictured the horrors of the war going on in China at the present time. Whether they call it war under a declaration of war or not, they are having war, and there is no doubt about it.

Mr. DAVIS. It is war without a declaration.

Mr. FRAZIER. There is no question of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think a proper interpretation of the Kellogg-Briand Pact would require a resort to the terms of the Kellogg-Briand Pact whenever there is a controversy between nations. There would not need to be a declaration of war. If there were any controversy or dispute between or among nations, automatically the Kellogg-Briand Pact would be applicable to that situation, and those who had the controversy or the dispute would be required to resort to the Kellogg-Briand Pact and to its terms in order to settle the dispute.

Mr. FRAZIER. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Pennsylvania asked about wars where no declaration had been made. We do not need to go back very many years to find a time when we had a similar situation in our own country. In a small country in Central America—Nicaragua—there was a war, but not one declared by the United States, and not even one declared by the people there, but we went there with our forces, helping to protect American property, and there was war in Nicaragua without declaration.

Mr. President, after the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact was adopted, from our increased appropriations for war purposes other nations could only conclude that the United States did not mean what it said in that peace pact. They could only conclude that the United States was not living up to the treaty and did not intend to. We talked peace and spent billions in preparation for war. The Kellogg Peace Treaty has thus far been just another silly, worthless, good-neighbor gesture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him the name of the document from which he read, something with reference to sanctions which the United States had not adopted. The Senator referred to an article, and I would like to have him state whence it came.

Mr. FRAZIER. In regard to sanctions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. It was a printed petition sent to the President and the Congress of the United States, signed by some 260 or 270 people living in New Jersey and New York. I do not know what the organization is or anything about it. I received a copy of this, and there were some very fine expressions in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair perhaps ignored the request of the Senator to have it embodied in the RECORD, if he made such a request, but perhaps the Senator read from it, and did not ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the petition contains some very good thoughts.

Mr. President, these immense expenditures for war purposes are continuing. No one can answer the questions which have been raised from time to time on the floor of the Senate and in other places as to what foreign nations are expected to attack us. What is the need of this increase in airplanes to 6,000? It seems to me that no foreign country is prepared to come across the great distance of the Atlantic Ocean or the Pacific Ocean to attack this country with its airplanes. The experts of the War and Navy Departments have said it is practically impossible for any country successfully to attack us. Yet we are asked to authorize the building of these additional planes to bring our total number up to 6,000. That will cost a great deal of money, much more than is mentioned in the pending bill, undoubtedly, even if the 10-percent profit limitation which the Senator from New Hampshire has proposed shall be adopted, and I hope it will be adopted.

There has been a world-wide mad scramble for increased armaments, and that has been the result, in my opinion, of the attitude of the United States in not living up to the Kellogg-Briand Treaty; but, on the contrary, immediately after the treaty was adopted, increasing appropriations for Army and Navy purposes. We have continued to increase all these years. In other words, the United States of America, which has talked peace, which was instrumental in getting this peace pact adopted, has been the leading nation of the world in increasing armaments for war purposes, preparing for war while talking for peace.

We are at this time building the biggest battleships ever constructed, authorized by the last Congress. We have had the largest peacetime Army and the largest peacetime Navy and the largest air force this country has ever had. What does it mean? Are the $6,000,000,000 expenditures for 6 years necessary for defense? Do we need the world's largest battleships for defense? Do we need new airplane carriers for defense, and cruisers good for a range of 10,000 miles for defense? It may be that we do, but they do not seem necessary to me.

Are we in such danger of attack that all these billions of preparation were necessary? In my opinion—and it has been agreed to by many of the outstanding military experts—there is little danger of attack from other countries. I do not believe there is any danger, at the present time, at least; and if the time should come in the future when we might be attacked, the airplanes we are building now, or authorizing to be built, would be obsolete and worthless, and new planes would have to be built.

No one can make me believe that all these war preparations are for defense. In my opinion they are preparations for war, and a foreign war at that. Does anyone know what nations are expected to attack us? Does anyone know who is going to invade our shores? Surely all the great nations of the world have their hands full at home at the present time, and there is no imminent danger of any attack upon the United States.

It is true that many strange moves and statements and explanations have been made in the Old World during the past several months, but who can interpret them, who knows what the real line-up is, who knows what secret treaties and agreements have been made, and by whom?

We do know that certain interested nations are doing their best to get Uncle Sam tied up with them before the conflagration that is predicted to take place next spring begins. We have recently heard about secret conferences and secret sessions here at home. The question naturally arises, Are we ourselves already involved in foreign entanglements and secret treaties? Who knows? If there is anyone who knows, he will not tell, because we have been unable to find out what these secret agreements are, if any, and whether or not we have any.

Dr. Charles E. Beard and many others seem to be worried for fear the Congress will delegate to the President our constitutional authority to declare war and give him the power to underwrite Great Britain and France secretly, and to decide what shall be done in case of another war in Europe.

There is agitation for the passage of the so-called industrial mobilization bill. According to my information, the bill has not been introduced at this session of the Congress, but it was introduced at the last session, and a great deal was said about it. It was modified somewhat at the last session, and still there is much agitation about it. I have had a number of letters from my home people and from other States in regard to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. If a measure of that character were passed, would it not be a confession of our approval of the totalitarian methods and philosophy? Personally we are regimented too much now; and the Federal Government, with its more than 200 agencies and departments and auxiliary organizations, is regimenting and controlling to a degree that is wholly inconsistent with democratic policies and with our concept of government. If any measure of the character of the industrial mobilization bill should be introduced, I sincerely hope the American people will almost unanimously oppose it.

Mr. FRAZIER. I join with the Senator in that hope; but, as the Senator from New Hampshire remarked during the course of his discussion a few moments ago, he wonders why the people did not rise up and protest against some of the crooked deals which have been put across in the departments of the Government; and I wonder, too.

This industrial mobilization bill was introduced in the last Congress—it was an administration measure—so that in the event of war the President of the United States would be given the power to draft about 4,000,000 young men for war purposes. The bill would not take the profits out of war; it would only limit them to some extent. The most objectionable feature of the bill is that it would set up a military dictatorship in the United States in case of war by giving the President almost unlimited control.

The American people have an abhorrence of any form of dictatorship. It is contrary to our form of government. We freely criticize government by dictators, whether it be Fascist, Nazi, Communist, militarist, or what not. The Congress has been severely criticized, and justly so, for conferring upon the President certain powers and prerogatives which seem plainly to belong to the Congress itself. Surely we will not go further and so delegate our powers as to make any President a dictator either in peacetime or in wartime. It is my hope and prayer that war can be avoided and that the spread of dictatorships can be stopped both abroad and at home.

Those who are opposed to war are, of course, opposed to the building of this large number of airplanes. They do not believe it is necessary at the present time to build so many airplanes.

The United States is supposed to be the richest nation on earth, and we criticize other nations and make bold statements about being ready to fight for "democracy, religion, and good faith among nations," while at home we have more unemployed and probably more poverty in our land of boasted plenty than may be found in any other nation in the world. Should we not clean up our own backyard and take care of our own people, and honestly prepare for peace instead of war? With one-third of our people admittedly ill-fed, ill-clad, and ill-housed, charity should begin at home. Preparations for war and propaganda breed hatred and contempt. Let us live up to our treaties before we criticize other nations for breaking theirs. Let us pass legislation that will insure our farmers a profit for their work. Let us provide employment at a living wage for all those who want to work. Let us enact an adequate old-age pension system. Let us properly provide for our own minorities before we criticize other countries in regard to the treatment of their minorities.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If the Senator will permit me, there are those who claim that if we have war we will have prosperity, for then there will be no unemployment. However, these gentlemen should think of the situation which would arise after a war. Then there would be increased taxes, and war taxes, increased poverty and increased misery and destitution. This would bring on conditions which might do away with democracy as we understand it in our country, and substitute perhaps an absolute autocracy or totalitarianism about which we talk so much. We, as Senators, are sworn to uphold democracy in the United States, and it is up to us to see that we avoid conflicts which may bring about forms of government yet undreamed of.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, someone has said that there never was a good war or a bad peace. While war sometimes makes profit and prosperity for some individuals, just as the World War brought prosperity to profiteers, who made as high in some cases as two or three thousand percent of profit, yet it was not profitable to the country at large or to the people at large, even to this day, and we have not gotten away from the devastating effects of the World War.

If the United States would only set a shining example by living up to the Kellogg-Briand Pact, if we would mind our own business and see that our people are properly provided for, reduce the annual appropriation billion-dollar military bill, quit stirring up hatred and trouble, and prepare for peace and justice instead of for war, it would mean happiness and prosperity to our people, and I am sure would have a very wholesome influence on the rest of the world.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the able Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I understood the Senator to speak of a billion-dollar annual appropriation. That is an old figure now. Now we approach $2,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. FRAZIER. About one and a half billion dollars is estimated for this year. Of course, it is not all estimated in the pending bill, according to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]—and I think he is correct—because it would be impossible to build the up-to-date combat planes and the other planes desired by the Army with the amount of money authorized by the bill.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I am for a reasonable degree of preparedness, of course, and I will vote accordingly. I myself have spent a considerable time in the Army; but when we begin to approach $2,000,000,000, and we may be approaching $3,000,000,000 next year, at the rate we are now increasing, just where are we going to stop? Some people are seeing spooks and bogeymen in their attics and are speaking of invasion of this country. If the Senator will permit, what country is going to invade us? The Japanese are too smart to attack this great Nation, with an industrial establishment about equal to that of all the other nations of the world combined. No nation in the world can leave its antagonist across the river in Europe and come over and attack us. No nation or combination of nations will attack us in this generation. There are plenty of military authorities who will sustain us in that thought. Why all this alarm, unless we are going over there to enforce our will upon somebody else, police the earth, and regulate the earth, and invade the Chinese rivers and European waters with our gunboats and our Army and Navy? If that is what they want, I certainly hope there will be a few votes against any such policy.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Minnesota. There is no danger of attack by any foreign country of which I know, and there is no danger of attack unless it be by some such fanciful creatures as those who were represented to be invading our country from Mars in a radio skit which was put on the air several months ago which scared some of the people of the United States out of their wits. But we do not believe there is any danger of invasion—any immediate danger, at least. Mr. Chamberlain, Prime Minister of Great Britain, made a statement recently—at least the statement is credited to him in the newspapers, and I presume it is correct—that this mad race for armaments would bankrupt every civilized nation on earth if it were continued, and I am sure it will. Some of them are broken now, or at least very badly bent. And our own people are now worrying, as they have been for the past several years, about how we shall balance our Budget.

Attention has been called in the Senate to the fact that when the present occupant of the White House was making his campaign for the Presidency in 1932 he made the statement that we were going to cut down the expenses of government and balance the Budget; but we have come far short of the mark, and gone deeper and deeper into debt, and are still going deeper into debt than we ever have been in the history of our Nation, and, in my opinion, more than there is any necessity for.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill authorizing the addition of 6,000 planes. I do not believe we need them. War is a crime against humanity, and in this day and age it seems to me we should be advocating peace instead of war, or, instead of criticizing other countries and their forms of government, which is none of our business. If any other nation on earth wants to adopt for itself a government different from ours, it is its privilege so to do. It is none of our business to interfere with its form of government. We do not think it is any other peoples' business that we have a democracy here in the United States. We propose to continue that democracy regardless of what other people may say. But by all odds our people, particularly those in high office, should refrain from making sarcastic criticisms of other countries and of the rulers of other countries, and criticizing their forms of government and their actions. Such conduct breeds contempt and hatred. I suppose it is meant for the purpose of propaganda, to bring about the enactment of a bill such as this, authorizing the building of the number of additional planes to bring our planes up to 5,500; or authorizing the construction of new planes to the number of 3,032, so as to bring the total to 5,500. It will cost, not the $300,000,000 talked about in connection with the pending bill, but several times that amount, certainly if we are going to build that many airplanes and combat planes for war purposes under the present conditions.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I was wondering if the Senator approves—I am sure he does not—the idea of sanctions.

Mr. FRAZIER. Absolutely not.

Mr. LUNDEEN. And I wonder whether the Senator agrees that we should assume the position of the Almighty, and say who are the aggressors; that we should sit in judgment upon the earth and name the aggressors, pass judgment on them, and inflict punishment accordingly, as though we were a court to sit in judgment upon all nations.

Mr. FRAZIER. No, Mr. President, I do not think we should, and I think it is un-American for anyone to advocate that kind of thing.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank the distinguished Senator. That is a good statement. The senior Senator from North Dakota is a man of good judgment and courage. He is absolutely right.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I think I should state first that several Senators desire to make some extended remarks on the bill, although they are not at this time ready to proceed; so I avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words about the bill, and then for a few moments I wish to discuss a subject which I think is directly related to the bill and to what we are doing in Congress at this time.

On the bill itself, Mr. President, we have listened to the debate for several days. So far as I am concerned, I have listened to it with a great deal of interest. We have listened not only to the arguments and debate from those who are in favor of the measure but also the arguments in opposition.

I wish to say first that I am in favor of the bill and shall support it. As much as any other Senator, I am in favor of peace and opposed to war. I favor the bill because I believe, Mr. President, that it will aid us in keeping out of war.

A moment ago the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] pointed out the fact that for 116 years we have been able to enforce the Monroe Doctrine without resort to force. What he did not tell us, however, was that for the past 116 years matters of international concern have been largely determined by reason. Today we are in a situation in which reason no longer prevails. Whether we like it or not, we must admit that many of our international affairs are now determined by raw force. So I believe in the pending bill. I believe in it because I believe it is an approach to preparing us for defense and because it is a defensive bill. I believe in it because I believe that the action of nations which now resort to force in carrying out their international policies will be determined, with respect to us and those interests in which we are concerned, solely by the question of our ability to defend ourselves. If we are in a proper position to defend ourselves, I believe we shall have peace.

I do not believe that any foreign nation will make a frontal attack upon the shores of the United States. I do not believe that a declaration of war, or war itself, will start suddenly on that basis. However, I do believe that when trouble comes, if it does come, it will be because of gradual encroachment upon some of the republics in the Southern Hemisphere; and that situation will not come in a day. It will build up day by day until the time comes when we shall either have to discard the Monroe Doctrine or defend it. I think that day will be delayed in proportion to our ability to demonstrate to those who believe in force, and whose only method of procedure is force, that we are in a position to protect our own here in the United States, and to protect the interests which we deem vital.

OUR FIRST LINE OF DEFENSE

Mr. President, the thing about which I wish particularly to speak today relates to something which to my mind is connected with the general situation. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the men who will from day to day care for the equipment and material we purpose to procure under the bills now pending for national defense. I refer, of course, to the members of the Regular Establishment. I refer to the men behind the guns. I refer to the men who will take care of our materials. I refer to the men who will take the first shock if trouble comes, and who will be in the first line of defense. I refer to the men who will sight the bombs and take care of the airships.

In the Seventy-fifth Congress I introduced Senate bill 3503, a bill to grant a more adequate pension to our disabled enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, and to the dependents of deceased Regulars. That bill was unanimously approved by the Committee on Military Affairs, of the Senate; and after a full statement of its provisions given by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], chairman of that committee, this body passed the bill without a dissenting vote. The bill went to the House Pensions Committee, and was by that committee referred back to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for additional data. The House was not afforded opportunity to vote upon the bill, and so it died with the last session of Congress. We were advised that the Department contemplated presentation of a Regular service pension bill at this session and that the President would then approve a pension increase for disabled Regulars, provided the increased rates did not exceed 60 percent of pension rates now provided for World War veterans.

Mr. President, I believe that the President of the United States, when all of the relevant facts come to his attention, will find neither cause nor desire to make such discrimination between the Regular enlisted man and the war veteran. I have introduced a new bill, Senate bill 522, which is now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs.

INADEQUATE COMPENSATION FOR DISABILITIES

Sometime ago my attention was called to a dramatic instance of the discrimination under present law. In this case a war veteran is receiving $105 for the loss of the use of an arm in a training camp thousands of miles from the enemy during the World War. A Regular, P. D. Ziegler, ship's cook on the ill-fated Panay, was surveyed from the United States Navy due to the fact that he lost the use of an arm from the bombing of the Panay by the Japanese last year, and for this disability he can draw only $37 a month in pension.

Mr. President, in Wyoming we have one of the Nation's major Army posts—Fort Warren. Before coming to the Senate I had noted the discrimination against the regular enlisted man, his meager pay, his wholly inadequate pension when disabled in line of duty, the uncertainty of that pension when once granted, and the inadequate provision made for the deceased enlisted man's dependents.

During the past 2 years I have gone deeper into the subject, and I am amazed at the actual conditions brought to my knowledge.

I find these Regulars when discharged, if suffering from service-connected disabilities, receive pensions as low as 35 percent of war rate for like disabilities.

I find that dependent mothers of line-of-duty deceased Regulars receive but $15 per month, while the mother of a line-of-duty deceased war veteran receives $45 per month.

I find a Regular suffering from the ravages of tuberculosis, and thus totally disabled, receiving but $45 per month, while the war veteran thus afflicted receives $100 per month.

In case of the tubercular, if the Regular is fortunate enough to eventually become an arrested case, his pension ceases, regardless of age or infirmities, while the arrested-case war veteran receives $50 per month for the rest of his life.

For loss of leg or arm the Regular receives but $37 per month while the war veteran with like disability receives from $90 to $105 per month.

Mr. President, I do not believe the war veteran and his dependents receive too large pensions. I wish that to be thoroughly understood. But I do feel, and the Senate by its action last session has shown its belief that pensions to Regulars and their dependents are too small.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE REGULARS

Why, may I ask, is the line-of-duty disabled enlisted man of our Regular Establishment subjected to so much discrimination in our laws? Why is he not even entitled to a flag for his casket—that flag to go to his nearest kin? Why is he denied C. C. C. enrollment? Why is he denied W. P. A. preference? Why is he denied recognition in the United States Employment Service as a veteran? Why, if in need, is he denied relief if he happens to draw a pitifully small pension for the sacrifice he made for, and the injury he received in the service of, his country?

Than the Regulars in the service of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard there are no persons in this Nation more quietly, solidly, completely, and fully American. Not even the discriminations under which they now suffer shade their loyalty to the flag and their country—our country. They are fully conscious of the laws' discrimination against them. They expect the Congress to do them justice. Shall we, by long delays, cause them to believe the Congress considers them inferior Americans? Shall they continue to serve the colors with consciousness that disability or death resulting from line-of-duty service will place upon them and their dependents the stigma of our discriminating laws? Many of them already feel that we hold them inferior in the service of their country. Tested by our inaction, we do that very thing, and we will be very derelict in our duty to them until we enact a law which will give them a pension more in keeping with their unselfish and unpolitical service and sacrifice to and for us.

I have heard the argument advanced that disabled Regulars, having incurred their disability during a time other than war, did so as a result of following their service as a career, and therefore were entitled to but very meager pensions. The trouble with that argument is that the facts assumed do not exist. The report of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs on H. R. 8949, Seventy-fifth Congress, which was a companion bill to my bill S. 3503, discloses that there were at date of that report 21,331 Regulars on the pension rolls disabled since 1898. This figure excludes World War and Spanish War veterans who, for some reason, are classified as Regulars. But of the 21,331 alleged career men, 10,878, over half of the pensioners, were disabled in the first 3 years of their service. Yet the War and Navy Departments hold in theory, reports, and some practice that 10 years' service is considered a prerequisite of career service.

When these lads of the Regular service first enlist, few of them realize what they are going into. At the enlisting places they see enticing lithographs of stream-lined girls, of foreign travel, of opportunities for advancement in education and knowledge. They know nothing, are told nothing, of the physically realistic and almost continuous war and naval games, the tactical and technical maneuvers, the hard labor, and the machine age of the Army. Neither does the recruiting officer mention that the recruit must implicitly obey every lawful order regardless of consequences, or he will be subjected to drastic disciplinary action. Neither is he informed that in case of actual war, conflict, or trouble the Regulars must meet the danger and hold the line until the National Guard and selective-draft forces can be trained and equipped for active duty at the front. Once enlisted, he learns these things, and it should be said to the credit of the Regulars that few of them shrink from duty, however exhausting or dangerous that duty may be.

EDUCATION AND EFFICIENCY OF THE REGULARS

Then, again, I have heard it said the enlisted Regulars lack somewhat the character, educational qualifications, and occupational efficiency of other men in similar grades of civil-life work. The Bureau of the Budget seems to have fallen for that falsehood.

The following quotation from a letter signed by L. D. Gasser, brigadier general, War Department General Staff, dated May 5, 1938, and described as a memorandum for Solicitor's Office, Veterans' Administration, is very interesting:

In connection with your conversation with Major Sawbridge, of my office, on Tuesday concerning the assertion of the Bureau of the Budget that the enlisted men of the Army did not represent as competent a wage-earning class as men being admitted to employment in civilian departments of the Government, I find that in the matter of education and occupational qualifications records of a representative group of enlisted men selected at random would seem to indicate that the Army group is fully representative of a cross-section of the employed men of the country.

A letter from the Navy Department on the same subject holds that the enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps are comparable in education and ability to other Government employees.

Mr. President, during the last session representatives of the Regular Veterans' Association, an organization composed exclusively of persons who have served in the Regular Establishment and in a time other than war, appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and presented a record of facts supporting the justice of this proposed legislation more fully than I do at this time. It is with gratification that I mention the unanimous support and sympathy given and shown by the Spanish-American and World War veterans who are members of our Committee on Military Affairs.

At this time, while our attention is being given to the necessity for adequate national defense, it is of first importance that we do full justice to the Regulars in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, not alone in pensions for themselves and the dependents of those Regulars deceased in line of duty, but in the matter of pay. On Wednesday, February 22, the Senate in its action on the independent offices appropriation bill added a rider to the bill which again denies to the Regulars a part of their income which has for many years been considered a part of their pay—a part of the pay of a man reenlisting in the service which was first granted in 1855. I trust that pay will be restored and that S. 522 will be enacted at the present session.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I again wish to say what I said in the opening, in effect, that there is nothing more important than that we take care of the man behind the gun; that we take care of the man who will look through the sights of our airplanes or antiaircraft guns or other equipment, because they in turn are taking care and will continue to take care of all the equipment for which we are now about to appropriate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the first amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "five thousand and five hundred" and to insert in lieu thereof "six thousand."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, unpopular as it is, and probably futile as it is, I am still one of those who believe that any waste of the taxpayers' money for any purpose is indefensible.

As I stated the other day in the remarks I made in the Senate, while I am willing to vote every cent of expenditure which is reasonably necessary for the adequate defense of the United States, I am not willing, particularly in this time of rising prices, due to the armament propaganda which has been spread about the country, to appropriate one cent more than is absolutely necessary for purposes of national defense.

I do not desire to detain the Senate by repeating the views I expressed the other day; but I again call attention to the fact that the pending committee amendment provides for the expenditure of an unlimited sum of money—depending on what the cost may prove to be—above that mentioned in the testimony of the experts of the War Department as to the necessities of national defense in the matter of airplanes.

Because some of the Members who are present today may not have heard what I said the other day, when I called attention to the fact that there is in the bill no limitation of any sort as to dollar expenditure, I repeat that there is in the bill no limitation of any kind on the construction of airplanes, except the limitation of 6,000 planes as against the limitation of 5,500 planes which was contained in the bill when it passed the House.

Of course, it has been said that there has been a recommendation from the President for $300,000,000 for airplane protection; but the only limitation of $170,000,000 which has been referred to a number of times on this floor is in a letter from the War Department—which, as I understand, has not even been put into the RECORD—breaking down the sum of $300,000,000 into $170,000,000 for the purchase of new planes and $130,000,000 for other purposes connected with aviation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that the question I am about to ask the Senator is in line with the point he is making.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to have the Senator ask any question.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like, however, to secure some further information as to the increased cost of the manufacture of airplanes.

I should like to go, I think, as far as almost any other Senator would go in the development of bombing airplanes as a matter of self-defense. I believe that to a very great extent the next war will be fought in the air. But the disclosures made, for instance, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOLSON], and one interruption of the Senator from New Hampshire by the Senator from Missouri himself, disclosed to me, it seemed, that the tremendous increase in cost is to a great extent artificial. We find from the investigations of the Munitions Committee that there are some indications that the increase represented by the higher bids comes from at least carelessness on the part of our own officials—in the Navy Department, for instance. Apparently they are not sufficiently careful, and are not exercising the care that their positions require them to exercise, in trying to combat the artificial increase which has taken place in the cost of manufacturing airplanes.

The other day, when the Senator was speaking, I asked him whether it would not be wise, either in this bill or in some other bill, to provide, as we have done in the case of the Navy, that the Government itself should manufacture at least a portion of the airplanes it requires, for that would exert a great leverage in keeping down the enormous prices which the Government at present is compelled to pay for airplanes. It occurred to me that it would be well if even in this bill some amendment of that kind could be adopted, or even if a Senate resolution could be passed reestablishing the Munitions Committee, of which the Senator from Missouri was an honored member, for the purpose of investigating the increase in the amount the Government has to pay for airplanes.

Since we are going into the matter on a larger scale—and I think we are justified in doing it; I do not want to interfere with the program—I think we ought to take the necessary steps, and take them now, to stop, if we can, the payment of fabulous prices by the Government for airplanes. I think a committee should be appointed to make an investigation of that subject, and I think such an investigation of itself would save many million dollars in the construction of airplanes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that I agree thoroughly with every word he has said as to the wisdom of the closest scrutiny of any proposal to increase cost of airplanes. The testimony which was referred to this morning by the Senator from New Hampshire and by me, and to which I and other members of the old munitions committee have referred many times on this floor, had to do with the purchase of naval craft, rather than the purchase of airplanes, because at that time the Government was not greatly increasing its purchase of airplanes. But I feel very certain that the same principle which has been applied to Government purchases of naval craft will in the future apply to the purchase of airplanes, particularly for the reason that under Mr. Woodring, as Secretary of War, in the purchase of airplanes in the last 2 years we have had the greatest assurance of fair competitive bidding that we have ever had, so far as my knowledge or investigation or recollection goes.

In the matter of the purchase of airplanes there has been the fairest bidding that we have ever had in the history of the United States with regard to the purchase of aircraft, because he required every airplane company which desired to sell airplanes to the War Department of the American Government to enter its planes in a fair competition and then made the purchases on the basis of demonstration.

Mr. President, a requirement has recently been waived in the case of the purchase of airplanes by the French Government. I refer to a requirement which was a concomitant of the one to which I have just referred, namely, that no military airplane could be sold to a foreign nation until 1 year after the second plane had been accepted by the United States Government, which was ordinarily nearly 2 years after the first plane was accepted; that is, until the requirements of the United States Government had absolutely been fulfilled, which had the effect of establishing a monopoly on the part of the Government in the purchase of such planes.

Under the new policy adopted by the Government for the sale of planes to foreign governments, that requirement has been waived. So it seems to me there is very great danger that there may ensue such a situation as the Munitions Committee discovered in the purchase of naval craft for the Government. We discovered that in the purchase in 1933 of naval cruisers there had been an increase of a very high percentage—I believe it was more than 35 percent; in fact, I know it was more than 35 percent, although I have forgotten the exact figures—as compared to the purchase of 1932 cruisers, without any increase whatever of labor costs and material costs; for, in fact, there was a decrease at that particular time in both. When we asked the Chief of Naval Construction and Repair why this condition was possible—and it happened to be in the same year in which some of the testimony was given to which the Senator from New Hampshire and I referred this morning—Admiral Land replied that he thought the bids the previous year had been too low. That was the year in which collusive bidding among the "Big Three" of the Shipbuilding Trust was absolutely established, at least to my satisfaction.

I feel that there is very great danger, in lifting the requirements which have been adopted heretofore with regard to the establishment of competition in the manufacture of airplanes, that we may again face that situation. Furthermore, I feel that, with the permission of the sale of airplanes to foreign governments before the necessities of the United States Army and Navy may have been fulfilled, we may have such a situation that the purchase of airplanes by foreign countries, instead of reducing our costs, will result in competition against the United States Government which will step up our costs.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What year was it the Senator referred to in which he said there was collusion in the bids submitted to the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was in the 1933 purchase of cruisers; and the comparison was between the 1933 prices and the 1932 prices, immediately before.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The N. R. A. Act was in effect at the time, was it not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The N. R. A. had not gone into effect at the time of the bidding referred to, and at that time there was no increase in either labor costs or material costs. The N. R. A. act was passed later in the year 1933.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In the War Department purchases, to which the Senator referred, in connection with which there was competitive bidding, did that competitive bidding result in different prices being asked by the various companies for the same kind of planes, or did they all bid the same prices?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The system of competition, as I understand, was of a different sort. The companies were required to submit unit bids, but the award was made—and if I am incorrect in this statement, I should be very glad to have some member of the Military Affairs Committee correct me—on the basis of best performance. I cannot say to the Senator from Minnesota that even that system has resulted in any reduction in the price of airplanes to the United States Government. On the other hand, quite the contrary is the fact, not by reason of the system of competition adopted but by reason of the greatly increased demand by the United States Government for airplanes, based on the act passed 2 years ago, and on the action in contemplation this year. This is illustrated by the testimony of General Craig, the very able and distinguished Chief of Staff of the United States Army, for whom I may say I have the very highest respect and regard, both because of his great ability and because of his very high character and unswerving integrity. On page 22 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs we find this testimony:

Senator HILL. Do you find a substantial increase in cost in the last 2 or 3 years?

General CRAIG. Yes, sir. It has been only a short time since a $50,000 plane was a real plane. Now they run up as high as $300,000, $400,000, $500,000, $600,000.

Senator LUNDEEN. Are they very much of an improvement over the other planes?

General CRAIG. Yes; but that has nothing to do with the increased cost of the materials.

Senator LUNDEEN. The materials that should go into them would be about the same as in the other?

General CRAIG. Probably most of them are more modern, more research connected with them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just a moment.

Senator JOHNSON of Colorado. The cost of production of automobiles has gone down.

General CRAIG. Yes. We have had our troubles about that. General Arnold is here, and he can give you the details of anything you want as to the cost of production of planes.

I wish to read, in connection with that, some testimony of the Secretary of War appearing on page 15 of the committee hearings:

Senator LEE. When you order planes have you had the experience that the manufacturer would come back with an increased price?

Secretary WOODRING. It is not so much the manufacturer. A good deal of that is the same in the Army and Navy as in private industry. When engineers start out to plan the best airplane or the best motor or the best of anything, they never reach the ultimate. When they plan an airplane we make an award for it, the company puts it on the line—say the Douglas Co.—and say it is the best air bomber on line, and the second or third best may have some very desirable military features. We make the award to the first one. After an award has been made we may find it very necessary to give a change order or to incorporate some secret device that we have learned from other planes in competition. That change order carries with it an increased price. There has been altogether too much of that. General Craig has been a great advocate of standardization, as far as possible. It is a very difficult problem, and we have tried in the past 3 years to eliminate as many change orders as we could, in trying to eliminate this item of increased cost.

Senator CLARK of Missouri. Whenever you have a tremendous impetus of manufacturing, do you not find there is an increase in the price of steel and manganese and various other raw materials, a jumping of prices of engines and everything else, and an increase in the cost of labor? We all remember when the men in the shipyards were getting $12 or $15 a day and wearing silk shirts, and when manufacturers were making unreasonable profits. Is that not inevitable in a situation of this kind?

Secretary WOODRING. I think so. Between 1914 and 1917, with the European War going on, everything was going up, and naturally the increase was much greater in cost than it was afterwards. However, today, in peacetime, if you order 100 bombers the unit cost is a certain price, and if you order 200 it is reduced materially per unit. Under the program we have followed in the last few years it will bring the unit cost down considerably.

Senator CLARK of Missouri. It may influence it, but we are now entering into this pre-war inflation that existed in 1914 to 1917. We are just now starting into that pre-war inflationary period.

Secretary WOODRING. I think that is a fair assumption.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator in just a moment. The point I am making, and the plea I am making to the Senate, is that if we do not adopt very drastic limitations, both as to number and price of the weapons and munitions and implements of war which are contemplated in this vast armament program of which we have just now learned of a second segment, and of which I predict we will learn of other segments which may startle the imagination—unless we adopt every possible limitation as to the number of the implements of war to be bought, and adopt every possible limitation as to the amount of money to be spent, we ourselves are likely to precipitate a degree of prewar inflation which will render the cost of the proposed rearmament program absolutely staggering to the imagination.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the Senator, the manufacturing of airplanes has not become standardized. Therefore many changes have to be made. That has been set forth in the testimony, as I understand. When one plane is completed it is found by the manufacturer that changes have to be made. Is that true?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that to be entirely correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If that be true, how can we have mass production unless we first have standardization? The foundation of mass production is standardization.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am unable to answer the Senator from Minnesota, because I myself do not understand it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Speaking of high prices and war prices, the Senator is aware that by many people it is thought unpatriotic to question the patriotism of those who make large war profits.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have never belonged to that school, let me say.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I know the Senator has not. I merely wanted to call that to his attention.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not understand that when the Chief of Staff, Gen. Malin Craig, was speaking about these different costs, running as high as $600,000 per unit, he was speaking about the initial planes constructed before the other planes were put onto the line, the preparation for which required research? Did he not refer to the cost of the initial planes, rather than the standard cost for a large number of planes in an order which afterward would be based upon that plane which, used in competition, cost a large sum of money?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, of course that to some extent is true, but the testimony of the Chief of Staff, which I just read, shows that he was speaking in an entirely comparative sense about the cost of a few years ago and the cost today. The cost of research has not increased to any such extent as that. Furthermore, all the testimony before the Military Affairs Committee was to the effect that the Government of the United States itself, the United States Army, pays a great proportion of the cost of the research which goes into the construction of new planes.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Along the line of the interrogation of the Senator from Vermont, and the reply of the Senator from Missouri, let me say that for experimental research purposes alone there have been expended by the Army and the Navy a total of $43,500,000 during the last 3 years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to have the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the airplane manufacturers get the benefit of that research, I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They not only get the benefit of the research of the United States Government but, on top of that, they have been able to make very large profits. With the lifting of the ban which has heretofore been placed on the sale of airplanes abroad to foreign countries, until the United States Government had fulfilled its own necessities, which has the effect of destroying the Government monopoly which has heretofore existed, no one knows how great an increase in price may be justified. It was testified before the committee by military experts that, while the War Department did not know and had no means of knowing the price for which the planes were sold to France, they would assume that the price of the planes sold to France was much higher than the price at which planes were sold to the United States Government. We have lifted the ban which has heretofore existed by reason of the regulation agreed upon by the aeronautics boards of the Army and Navy, but we have no knowledge whatever how much increase in price is justified by reason of foreign countries bidding against our own country for planes.

Therefore, Mr. President, I repeat that I am very much opposed to the increase contained in the committee amendment above the number of planes testified to by the experts of the War Department to be necessary in the first place; and in addition to that I intend, when the time comes for offering individual amendments, to offer an amendment providing for a limitation as to the expenditure in dollars, and limit it to what was estimated to be necessary in the letter from the War Department, which was $170,000,000; for unless we adopt a limitation in dollars and unless we take some of the steps suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] for protecting ourselves against exorbitant prices, by the establishment of Government factories, and the most stringent investigation of the awards, we are likely to find ourselves in a situation not only of collusive bidding, such as existed between American manufacturers in the construction of naval vessels; but we shall have, in addition to that, a system of unrestrained competition between the United States Government and foreign governments; and if the bill passes in the shape in which it is brought into the Senate today, the War Department might spend a billion dollars instead of $170,000,000 for the purchase of airplanes and then come back to Congress with a request for a deficiency appropriation, as we have seen happen so often.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The most legitimate argument I have heard for this bill is that it will help business. I do not believe that there is any more chance of any foreign country invading the United States than there is of Santa Claus coming down here in the month of July. If the passage of the bill will help business, why should there be any objection so long as business wants to get the money, to have it all at once; and have their own prices and profits? The most legitimate argument I have heard for the bill is that it will help business. If that is the purpose of the bill, why limit the profits?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota—and I am sure that he will agree with me—that it would be much preferable and more proper to give it to them in the way of outright grants rather than gouge the Government.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I recall that only a few years ago we were building a certain type of naval vessel at a cost of a little in excess of $3,000,000. The same type of vessel now costs the United States Government in excess of $8,000,000, but the differentials in labor costs and material costs could not possibly justify such a vast difference in the price. The plans are prepared by the Navy Department. It will be recalled by those who saw the figures that one private airplane company in this country reported very calmly net profits in 7 or 8 years of 1,142,000 percent, which was 11,420 times its entire capital.

I say to my brethren of the Senate, unless we are very careful we will have another Roman holiday on our hands which will justify another very thorough and searching investigation into this business, and it will have very dark and gloomy nuances, and instead of being national defense it will be something else which is far less palatable. I cannot contemplate a raid of that kind on the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington will recall that in the year after the act setting up the new Maritime Authority was passed Mr. Joseph Kennedy, who at that time was the Chairman of the Maritime Commission, and is now Ambassador to Great Britain, appeared before the Committee on Commerce and testified that the lowest bid received for the construction of the ships to be built by the Government or financed by the Maritime Commission was some 80 percent in excess of the estimates made by the Maritime Commission experts as to general basis on which they should be made. That, Mr. President, was directly traceable—I think no one can deny it—to the fact that in the same year the Congress of the United States had passed a bill providing for a supernavy, as it was then considered, although we are now told that we have a pitifully inadequate Navy, and the passage in the same year of an act authorizing the construction of a great number of merchant vessels, to be paid for and financed by the United States Government. It was perfectly obvious to anyone who took the trouble to read the facts in connection with the transaction that the shipbuilders, considering the tremendous impetus in the building and purchase of ships to be financed by the United States Government, jacked up their bids, and that all others who had anything to do with the construction of ships, whether it was in connection with labor or materials or anything else, in consideration of that program proceeded to jack up their prices.

I asked the Chairman of the Maritime Commission, Mr. Kennedy, when he appeared before our committee, if he could form any estimate, on the basis of the increase in demands from the shipbuilding companies, of the increase which would be made in the cost of naval vessels, taking the program as a whole, and he said that if the present ratio continued he thought it would be absolutely incalculable. I can see no reason why the same rule may not apply in the purchase or construction of these airplanes.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senator will recall, I am sure, as other Members of the Senate will recall, that upon a number of occasions the Navy bill has come before us containing language to the effect "that no part of this appropriation shall be used to maintain or operate the Government airplane factory in Philadelphia." I do not know what motivates the Navy Department in its desire to kill the Government airplane factory in Philadelphia, but upon a number of occasions the Department itself has recommended language which would have destroyed the only possible yardstick the Government has in dealing with private airplane companies.

I think we are all in agreement that a net profit of over 1,000,000 percent to a private airplane company which does from 30 to 80 percent of its entire business with the Government is, to say the least, an astounding profit. We have absolutely no protection from that sort of gouging unless we take steps to protect ourselves. For one, I shall watch the program with much interest; and I hope I can join others in having an investigation of the whole airplane picture in case we find such an outrageous thing as that occurring again. The taxpayers have a right to have 100 cents of national defense for every dollar we sweat out of them in taxes. We have no moral right to tax Americans beyond their just deserts in order to enrich airplane manufacturers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say to my friend from Washington and my other colleagues in the Senate that I am in favor of any steps which may be desirable or necessary for the purpose of investigating transactions which may take place. However, I am much more concerned at the present moment in locking the stable door before the horse is stolen by imposing limitations upon these expenditures which will prevent running up vast expenditures and a tremendous increase in the unit price.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is on his feet. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky in a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I do not wish to ask a question, but desire to make an observation. If nothing is said about it, I fear silence may be construed as tacit approval.

For one, Mr. President, my purpose in supporting the bill is not because I want to improve business. If the bill is passed, I shall be very glad if the result is an improvement to business. However, that is not my motive. I do not believe it is the motive of my colleagues.

It has been said that the principal object, or perhaps the only object, of the bill is to improve business. I do not agree with that statement. Such a motive does not apply to me. I have long felt that the Federal Government was not up to date in its preparation for war in the air. On account of events which have taken place since the World War, as a result of whatever information I could obtain, I have reached the conclusion, whether rightly or wrongly, that we are weak in the matter of airplanes and bombing machines in the air. I support the bill with the idea that we intend to improve that arm of our military service. I believe it is patriotic to do it. I believe it is good business to do it.

However, at the same time I do not want to permit private corporations and individuals to mulct the Government out of a great many hundreds of millions of dollars just because I think the Government is engaged in a very worthy enterprise. It seems to me, therefore, that we should take all possible precautions to see that in carrying out the objects of the bill we eliminate as much as possible the danger of a situation in which the Government can be mulcted, as it has been in the past, by combinations of great corporations engaged in supplying the Government with its military needs. I think we should be derelict in our duty if we did not take such precautions.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] was on his feet a moment ago. I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of course, the present bill is only an authorization. The bill does not carry an appropriation. The various committees of the two Houses will have to deal later with the matter of appropriations. It seems to me that we can control the amount of expenditure by the amount of money which we appropriate.

We cannot fight in the air with dollars. If we could, we should not need to build any airplanes. We could simply set aside $170,000,000 or $300,000,000 and let the dollars fight the enemy airplanes.

What we are seeking to do is to obtain the number of airplanes which will be regarded as adequate. I would rather vote for an amendment to limit the amount of profit that may be made by airplane companies than to jeopardize the program by limiting the appropriation. I do not know what profits airplane companies make. Many of them are not paying any dividends. I understand that some of them are; but the dividends are not exorbitant. The aviation industry is still a new industry. I am just as much opposed to airplane factories mulcting the Government as I am to shipyards doing the same thing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So am I.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would rather vote to limit the profits of airplane companies than to limit the appropriation out of which we hope to build a certain number of planes, whether it be 5,500 or 6,000. Can we not more logically control the amount of profit than the amount of money? In the very logical sequence of events and development of costs a limitation of the amount might result in our obtaining a smaller number of airplanes than we really need.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My friend from Kentucky and the other advocates of the committee amendment meet themselves coming back when the Senator from Kentucky advances that argument. The testimony before the Military Affairs Committee was that 5,500 planes are adequate to the national defense of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me to finish my statement, the testimony of General Arnold and the other military experts before the committee was that 5,500 planes are sufficient for the adequate defense of the United States. The other day I read the testimony of General Arnold in which he said, "I am for this program here, hook, line, and sinker," meaning the 5,500 planes. He also said, "I cannot see any need at this time for anything more."

The argument of the committee when it came on the floor with the proposal, as was stated by the Senator from Texas in making his opening statement, was that there was a limitation of $170,000,000; that in no event would more than $170,000,000 be spent, but that it was possible to obtain 6,000 planes for $170,000,000 as easily as 5,500 planes. The other day I stated that that argument appeared to me to be an indictment of the intelligence of every airplane manufacturer in the country, and that it seemed to be a very poor rule that would not work both ways, because if it were true that we could obtain more planes than we need for $170,000,000, then by the same rule we could obtain the number of planes we need for less $170,000,000.

I then pointed out that there is no limitation of $170,000,000 in the bill. The Senator from Kentucky comes back, in direct variance with the position taken by the chairman of the committee and the majority of the committee in voting for 6,000 planes, and says that if we put in a limitation we may not be able to obtain as many planes as we need. If those are not absolute contradictions in terms, then I am unable to understand the English language.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am undertaking to direct myself to the suggestion which seems to be in the mind of the Senator from Missouri in his argument that by the passage of the bill Congress loses control of the amount of money available. I do not think so. I think Congress takes full control of the matter by reason of the amount of money which will be appropriated to carry out the authorization, not in any one year, but over a 2-year period.

In connection with the testimony before the Military Affairs Committee, regardless of what General Arnold or any other officer said before the Committee on Military Affairs, when the recommendation was made to the House of Representatives, at the time the first bill was introduced on the 18th of January by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it provided for 6,000 planes. I have before me a copy of the bill, House bill 2780.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When the Senator from Kentucky says we do not lose control by not having a limitation in dollars, I call his attention to the language of the bill:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to equip and maintain the Air Corps with not to exceed 6,000 serviceable airplanes.

I know that from the long and distinguished career of the Senator from Kentucky in the House of Representatives and in this body, he knows that if we give to the Secretary of War a mandate to build 6,000 planes without any limitation on the amount of money to be expended, the Secretary of War is perfectly justified in going ahead and building the 6,000 planes, even if they cost $1,000,000,000, and obligating the United States to a deficiency appropriation in the amount necessary to make up the deficiency.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under this authorization, 6,000 planes is the maximum, the limit. The whole process has to go through the Appropriations Committee.

Let us suppose that the Appropriations Committee, in dividing the expenditure over a period of 2 years, provides for $170,000,000 the first year. Suppose the War Department comes in and says there has been a legitimate increase in the cost of airplanes—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is precisely what I fear.

Mr. BARKLEY. Because of the increased cost of labor, material, or for any other reason. The War Department must make a showing before the Appropriations Committee before it can obtain a dollar above the $170,000,000. Yet if it does make a showing of necessity justifying the increased appropriation, certainly the Senator from Missouri would not want to cut down the number of airplanes that could be built under the authorization.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, no Senator knows better than does the Senator from Kentucky, unless it be the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], who has the headache which ensues from deficiency estimates, that if Congress appropriated $170,000,000 for the purchase of airplanes under this authorization and the War Department spent $1,000,000,000 for the purchase of 6,000 airplanes, let us say, to take an exaggerated case, and then came to Congress with a request for a deficiency appropriation, no man would dare to stand on the floor of the Senate or the House of Representatives and say that when the Government of the United States, under a blanket authorization passed by the Congress of the United States, had exceeded the amount of money appropriated, we would not be in honor bound—and, as a matter of fact, legally bound, when a legal contract had been entered into—to appropriate the money necessary to make up the deficiency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator mean to say that under this bill we are giving the War Department a blank check to spend any amount it may desire to spend for airplanes?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true so long as the War Department does not buy more than 6,000 planes. I do not think any Senator on this floor will controvert that statement. The only limitation whatever in dollars contained in this bill has nothing at all to do with the purchase of airplanes, but has to do with the increase in the defense facilities for the Panama Canal, in connection with which there is provided a limitation in the authorization of dollars; but that principle is not followed in the other provisions of the bill. Answering the question of the Senator from Minnesota directly, I do mean to say that, if this bill is passed in its present form, so long as not more than 6,000 planes are purchased, there is no protection whatever against the Government of the United States being obligated in an absolutely unlimited sum. I do not mean to say that I think the War Department would do that, but there is nothing in the provisions of the bill, there is no single line in the bill, which would prevent the United States Government being obligated to $1,000,000,000, or $2,000,000,000, or $3,000,000,000, or any other sum the War Department, under this bill, might see fit to obligate it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. As I have listened to the debate, I have come to understand that in the testimony before the Military Affairs Committee there was an estimate as to the cost of the 6,000 planes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say that I do not recall that in the testimony before the committee, and I do not think it will be found in the hearings of the committee, but there was a recommendation in the message of the President of the United States for the expenditure of $300,000,000 for the aviation service. Later, in a letter to the chairman of the committee, the War Department broke down the figures into $170,000,000 for the purchase of new planes and $130,000,000 for the maintenance of planes, for ground establishments and other items entering into the increase of the aviation service; but I do not think anywhere in the testimony of the committee—at least I do not recall it—there was presented in an official sense an estimate of $170,000,000.

Mr. ADAMS. In view of my understanding as to the probable cost my inquiry is, Why not put a limit, approximately, of the amount of $170,000,000 in the bill and provide that there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for this purpose that sum of money?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is precisely the proposition which I have been arguing; that is precisely the effect of the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. What is the objection to it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator will have to ask Senators on the other side of the question. I will say that I intend to offer such an amendment at the proper time as soon as individual amendments, instead of committee amendments are in order, because, if it is proposed to spend $170,000,000 for the purchase of airplanes, I do not see why the Congress should not say so. I will say to the Senator that the only justification which so far has been urged, not as a matter of military necessity, for the increase from 5,500 planes to 6,000 planes was the suggestion that we could by bargaining buy 6,000 planes just as cheaply as 5,500 planes; in other words, that we could buy 6,000 planes within the limit of $170,000,000 instead of merely 5,500 planes. As I have heretofore suggested on this floor, it seems to me it is a very poor rule that does not work both ways, and I cannot see why, if we can buy all the planes we need to buy and buy 500 planes more than we need to buy for $170,000,000, we cannot buy all the planes we need for considerably less than $170,000,000 and save that much money to our pressed taxpayers.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator except to make a brief statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to have the Senator make any statement he desires to make.

Mr. LOGAN. Reference has been made to the purchase of 5,500 planes and the purchase of 6,000 planes. I believe the public is somewhat confused by reason of the way we have expressed ourselves. The fact is that there is no idea of purchasing either 5,500 planes or 6,000 planes, but it is really a question of 3,032 planes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I accept the suggestion of the Senator. The authorization is for a total number of planes which, including the planes which we now have and which are in good repair, will bring the number up to 5,500.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. The Senator, if I understood him correctly, suggested a few moments ago that he does not recall any break-down being given in the hearings as to how the $300,000,000 was to be expended.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator that I saw that in a letter which was shown to me by the chairman of the committee. I do not recall it in the record.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I merely wish to say that the break-down was not in a letter to me; it was in an estimate prepared for the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. On page 18 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on the bill H. R. 3791, we find the testimony there of General Craig, in which he gives the break-down as follows:

For aviation we propose to expend $170,000,000 for 3,032 planes, $33,000,000 for personnel, $62,000,000 for construction, $14,000,000 for organizational equipment, $8,000,000 for bombs, $7,000,000 for instructional equipment and payments to civilian flying schools, $3,000,000 for maintenance, $3,000,000 for research.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator from Alabama for calling my attention to that testimony in the record, which I had overlooked, although I was familiar with the same figures in a communication shown to me by a Senator in the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the statement of General Craig in the record is that "For aviation purposes we propose to expend $170,000,000 for 3,032 planes." That would be an average of $56,062 per plane. If the Department were given a billion dollars for the same number of planes the average would be $330,000 a plane, which would be about the average the general gives on page 32 of the cost of planes at the present time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me just a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] probably misunderstood in part my remarks of a little while ago. I said the most legitimate reason and argument I have heard for the pending bill are that it is to help business. As to that, others may differ in opinion, and, of course, I do not question their sincerity, but, so far as I am concerned, that is the most legitimate argument I have heard for the bill, because of existing conditions. Today I can see no immediate danger of attack upon the United States by any foreign country. The other nations of the world are too busy watching their back doors to keep their neighbors from coming in and taking away what they have.

The planes provided by the pending bill, as I understand, are for the defense of our common country. That is another matter; but if there is to be no attack, we do not have to defend. However, I can see that, as a matter of insurance for the future in case something should happen we cannot now foresee, it is perfectly legitimate to vote for this kind of bill.

I wanted to make that explanation in view of the apparent misunderstanding that the Senator from Nebraska had.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in my conclusion that there is a limitation on the number of planes but no limitation upon the money to be expended?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to ascertain from the Senator if he agrees with my interpretation that this is an authorization, not for the immediate construction of airplanes up to 6,000, but for the maintenance of an airplane force up to 6,000. It is not limited to expenditures this year, next year, or the year after that; that is, authority is given to the War Department to declare any planes obsolete at any time, and then the authority for an appropriation with which to construct up to 6,000 would continue indefinitely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say that I believe the statement of the Senator from Colorado is absolutely correct. There is absolutely no limitation whatever in this bill except the authority to construct or purchase or maintain 6,000 planes; there is absolutely no limitation whatever in this bill as to the personnel, the cost of personnel involved in the increase, or as to the number of planes, or as to the time when the money shall be spent. There is no limitation whatever of $170,000,000 for the purchase and construction of planes. There is not a single dollar of limitation in the bill as to the cost of maintenance. There is nothing in the bill to prohibit the Secretary of War, so long as he does not purchase more than 6,000 planes, spending a billion dollars for the purchase of planes and another billion for the maintenance of planes. There is no limitation whatever on the increase of the personnel authorized to maintain the increased number of airplanes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was very much interested in what the Senator had to say a while ago about the limitation of profits on the building of these airplanes. Of course, there is nothing in the bill on that subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is not.

Mr. McKELLAR. But does the Senator propose to offer an amendment of that kind? With an enormous project of this kind, it seems to me there ought to be a limitation upon the profits to be made from the expenditure of so vast a sum of money. The Senator is on the committee, and I hope he will offer an amendment limiting the profits on airplanes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I am absolutely in accord with that position. I understood earlier in the day, from the very able address of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], that he intended to offer such an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry that I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that it is my purpose to support that amendment as vigorously as I can. Even without an amendment, however, I still think we ought to have a limitation in dollars on the appropriation we are making; and I am still opposed to making an authorization for a larger number of planes than is necessary. I am in favor of the House provision. I am opposed to the Senate amendment. At the proper time I propose to offer an amendment of my own to put a limitation of $170,000,000 upon the purchase or acquisition of planes in accordance with the President's recommendation on that subject, and then I intend to support the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I suppose nobody assumes that the object of the President or of Congress or of the War Department would be to construct 5,500 planes or 6,000 planes, or a sufficient number to bring our force up to 6,000 or 5,500 planes, and then quit—just build 6,000 planes and go off and leave them. We shall have to maintain them; and I suppose the object of this measure is to maintain our air force at the maximum of 5,500 or 6,000 planes.

I am going to vote for the number of 6,000 planes because when the War Department made their recommendation, according to the first bill which was introduced in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I think they had 6,000 planes in mind. What happened to reduce the number, I do not know; and that is a matter which it is not necessary to discuss. If the Senator proposes to offer an amendment to place a limitation of $170,000,000 on the program which is outlined for the next 2 years, we cannot build the desired number of planes, as I understand, for that amount. The President recommended a program of about $500,000,000 over a period of 2 years; but, as I understand, more than $170,000,000 of the $500,000,000 was to go into the construction of airplanes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is not true according to the testimony just read by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

Mr. BARKLEY. But, regardless of that, whatever it may cost to build these planes, we shall have to maintain them; we shall have to man them; and, of course, it is obvious that the annual appropriation necessary to maintain an air force of 5,500 or 6,000 planes will be greater than the annual appropriation necessary to maintain what we have at this time. How can a limitation of $170,000,000 on a 2-year program of $500,000,000 for construction guarantee the maintenance of that force, or even authorize the Appropriations Committee thereafter to bring in appropriations to maintain that force?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My dear friend the Senator from Kentucky evidently was not paying any attention to what I said.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was, Mr. President. I listened attentively to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I said was that I was in favor of adopting an amendment to carry out literally the recommendation of the President of the United States, who said that $170,000,000 was estimated for a program for the construction and purchase of airplanes for 2 years. That is precisely the amendment I intend to offer and favor adopting.

Mr. BARKLEY. If that be true, the President could only make an estimate. He could not project himself 2 years into the future and determine what the cost of airplanes might be 2 years from now. There might be legitimate increases in cost. Because there are legitimate increases, it does not follow that somebody is always mulcting the Government; and, of course, it is not true that the Department can spend a billion dollars a year for 2 years under the present authorization, because the Department cannot get $2,000,000,000, or even half a billion dollars, unless it is appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, of course that is entirely correct; but neither the Senator from Kentucky nor any other Senator on this floor will say that if the War Department, in pursuance of this mandate for the construction of 6,000 planes, passed without any limitation whatever as to expenditure, were actually to spend a billion dollars for the purpose, the Government of the United States would not be both morally and legally bound to appropriate the amount.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Where would the War Department get the billion dollars, except through the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas, from his long and distinguished service, certainly is familiar with the fact that departments of the Government, unless they are specifically limited by law as to their authority, and sometimes when they are so limited, very frequently spend more money than has actually been appropriated by Congress and come back here with deficiency estimates, and every year we pass two or three great deficiency bills to take care of expenditures in cases in which exactly such things have happened.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; but not to any such extent as the Senator has suggested.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Perhaps that is so. I stated, when I mentioned those figures, that I was taking an exaggerated case.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, suppose we should fix a limitation of $170,000,000 for this 2-year program, so that the War Department could not expend any more than that, and the Appropriations Committee could not appropriate any more than that; and then suppose it should turn out, in 1941, or before the expiration of the 2-year period, that the cost had gone up so that the Department actually, in good faith, could make a showing that in order to carry out the authorization for 5,500 or 6,000 planes they would need more money, we should have fixed a limitation in the authorization; and in order to save the appropriation from a point of order, if it were contained in a general appropriation bill, it would be necessary to increase the authorization by a special act before the Appropriations Committee could provide the amount.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, that is true; and that has been the whole parliamentary theory of this Government since the foundation of the Republic down to the past 5 or 6 years, when we entered upon the deplorable habit of Congress signing blank checks in making appropriations.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate on this subject. I did not intend to do anything except to call attention again very briefly to the issues. I think we are now faced with a situation in which we are entering upon a policy of almost unlimited expenditure for armament, unless the Congress of the United States, at this very first opportunity, expresses itself in favor of the most stringent limitations which can be placed by the Congress of the United States, under its constitutional authority, upon these expenditures.

I say again that I am in favor of voting every penny which is necessary for adequate defense of the United States. I am not in favor of voting one penny in excess of that figure, to be spent in the discretion of bureaucrats either of the Army or of the Navy or of any other department of the Government.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that there are some tremendous variations in the subject matter before us. The Senator has brought out some of them; but the need of 5,500 planes, taking General Craig's testimony which the Senator quoted and I quoted earlier today, in regard to the cost of $200,000 a plane, when he said there was a great increase from the past to the present, would call for an expenditure of $1,100,000,000 for the 5,500-plane provision. We ought to know what we are doing and where we are going when we vote for this proposal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if he has reduced his proposed amendment to writing?

Mr. TOBEY. I have, and I am ready to offer it when the proper time comes.

Mr. BONE. Is it in form similar to the amendment to the Navy bill?

Mr. TOBEY. It is identical, only the Army takes the place of the Navy.

Mr. BONE. It is identical in language with the amendment attached to the Navy bill?

Mr. TOBEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am in favor of the most rigid control of expenditures and of any reasonable or even drastic limitation on expenditures, in order to prevent extravagance or corruption. I am willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] limiting profits to 10 percent. A similar provision applies to the Navy, and I see no reason why the Army should not be subjected to the same restriction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not in order at the present time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that. I say I am willing to accept it so far as my own action goes. I am addressing the Senate now on the matters brought up by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The Senator from Missouri says there is no limitation on expenditures in this bill. There is the limitation which is always on all authorized expenditures, and that is the action of the Appropriations Committee. The War Department could no more gather a billion dollars from the air, or some part of the country, than it could change ordinary metal into gold. It would have to have magic powers in order to raise a billion or two billion dollars from any other source than the source to which it must go for the usual appropriations.

The War Department originally asked for a limit of 6,000 planes. The War Department proposed that there should be a maximum authorization of 6,000 planes in order to carry out the project for an average number of about 5,500 planes. The President came before the Congress and specifically suggested, out of his proposal of an expansion of national defense involving $550,000,000, the appropriation of the sum of $300,000,000 for airplanes, personnel, and so forth. In the break-down which the War Department has prepared for the Military Affairs Committees, $170,000,000 is assigned for the purpose of procuring about 3,032 planes. The purchase of 3,032 planes would give us 5,500 planes, when added to the present program which contemplates about 2,500 when finished. The rest of the $300,000,000 is to be expended, so much for organizational equipment, so much for bombs, so much for instructional equipment and flying-school tuition, so much for personnel—the Senator stated that no limitation whatever had been placed on the amount of money required for personnel, but here the break-down shows $33,000,000 for personnel—so much for construction, so much for maintenance, and so much for research; the total being $300,000,000 on the word of the President and the War Department. That is what is desired under the maximum authorization of 6,000 planes and their equipment, installation, maintenance, and so forth.

The War Department, in connection with the President's plan, estimated that there should be a maximum authorization of 6,000 planes in order to maintain an average number of 5,500 planes, including the front-line fighting planes, the observation planes, the pursuit planes, the photographic planes, the transport planes, and others. When we say that we shall have an average number of 5,500 planes, that does not mean that we shall have 5,500 planes at the front in fighting condition. It means that we shall have about 1,900 or 2,000 front-line fighting planes when this entire program shall have been carried out.

In order that the War Department may stay securely within the law, and yet at the same time procure planes at the most economical figure, having in mind the frequent changes in type, development, and cost figures, it is necessary that the legal authorization be for a greater number of planes than the number it is desired to maintain. The limit on expenditures is provided first in the limit on the maximum number of planes.

I had in mind attaching a cash limitation also, and took the matter up with the Comptroller General, who stated that the authorization of the activity was sufficient authorization, and that it would then rest with the Committee on Appropriations as to what amount of money could be expended to carry out the activity.

The Committee on Appropriations, under the pending bill, could limit the War Department to a thousand additional planes, or 500 additional planes. The committee thought that on account of the uncertainty connected with design and development, production not yet being standardized, it might cripple the plan to adopt a cash limitation under which the desired number of planes might not be procurable.

It seems to me that with the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, with the break-down already prepared for the committee by the War Department, there can be no danger of the possibilities to which the Senator from Missouri alludes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The Senator has said that this is the usual procedure, and I think he is absolutely correct. There is nothing extraordinary, nothing unprecedented, about the procedure we are following with reference to the authorization in the bill. On the contrary, it is the procedure which we follow every day. For instance, the Army buys trucks, the Army buys automobiles, blankets, shoes, all kinds of articles. We do not have to pass an authorization bill to enable the Army to buy a certain number of shoes or trucks. We sometimes pass a basic bill authorizing the Army to have so many trucks or so many shoes, and as trucks and shoes wear out, or become obsolete, or have to be replaced for any other reason, under the authorization the Committee on Appropriations can bring in the appropriation to bring the supply up to the amount needed by the War Department as authorized. Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my understanding.

Mr. HILL. So now we are passing an authorization bill, laying down, as it were, a program under which we expect to have 5,500 planes, or thereabouts, for the Army. If we were to provide an amount of money in the bill just to build up the number of planes to the 5,500, that would mean that every time there was to be a replacement or any new planes had to be procured to take the place of those obsolete and worn out, there would have to be a new authorization. We do not do that in the case of shoes; we do not do it in the case of blankets, or automobiles, or trucks, or the thousand and one other things needed not only by the War Department, but by every other department of the Government. So why should we have any other procedure?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is exactly my understanding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and ordinarily when authorizations are granted by the Congress a limit is fixed. I find on page 18 of the hearings that General Craig stated specifically how much money he wanted, and what he was going to spend it for:

For aviation we propose to expend $170,000,000 for 3,032 planes—

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is for the planes alone.

Mr. McKELLAR. General Craig continued—

$33,000,000 for personnel, $62,000,000 for construction, $14,000,000 for organizational equipment, $8,000,000 for bombs, $7,000,000 for instructional equipment and payments to civilian flying schools, $3,000,000 for maintenance, $3,000,000 for research.

I have added up the figures, and, according to my arithmetic, they amount to $300,000,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is what I stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why does not the Senator follow the usual course in such matters and authorize the expenditure of $300,000,000 for that purpose? That would be good legislation. Some have said that we have departed from that practice in the case of other bills. If we have, we ought to return to a uniform plan, one which has been followed ever since I have been connected with the Government, namely, that when we give authority to the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate money, we fix a limitation. I have looked at section 8, as amended, on page 1 of the bill, and I have looked at succeeding sections, and there is no limitation at all on the amount of money to be expended. I think it would fully meet the situation the Senator has in mind, and what is asked for by the chief of staff himself, if we authorized the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate as much as $300,000,000 for this purpose.

If new authority should be needed in other years, it could be provided; but when we are dealing with a specific sum for a specific purpose, for the purpose of adding to the air force—and I am thoroughly in favor of it and expect to vote for the bill—we should follow the older plan. I am thoroughly in favor of the bill, but it does seem to me there ought to be a limitation in the interest of orderly government.

As the Senator knows, I have served for a number of years on the Committee on Appropriations. Authorizations are usually followed to the limit, and I feel that in the interest of good legislation—careful, economical legislation—there ought to be a limitation of $300,000,000. Before the consideration of the bill shall be concluded I will propose an amendment authorizing the expenditure of $300,000,000, and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the difficulty is in the fact that the $170,000,000 is largely an estimate. No one can tell today exactly what the cost of these planes will be.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Army cannot tell, it is remarkable. They ought to know, and I believe they do know, how to make the estimate. I think they are just as accurate as we are. The plan I suggest is an orderly method of procedure. We have followed it throughout the history of our Government, so far as I know. We authorize expenditures in a bill such as this. If authorizations were not needed, this bill would not have to be passed at all. All that would be necessary would be to go before the Committee on Appropriations and ask for what was wanted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Committee on Appropriations would not necessarily give it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether they would or not. Let us put it on the basis we have been adopting for many, many years.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator say that that has been the uniform practice?

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot say the practice has been uniform. I think there have been exceptions, but ordinarily that is the practice.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, on Saturday we held a celebration in this Capitol in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the meeting of the Congress and of that practice.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Tennessee is the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. HILL. He is also a very valuable member of the Committee on Appropriations. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. Is it not true that every year the Post Office Department buys trucks?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but it is authorized by law to buy trucks.

Mr. HILL. That is correct, and an authorization to purchase is exactly what is proposed here. In the authorization under which the Post Office Department buys trucks there is not any sum of money mentioned, and the reason it is not mentioned is to make certain that the practice will be followed of coming to Congress each year and getting the appropriation to buy whatever new trucks may be necessary to supplant those which are worn out and no longer serviceable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator speaks of trucks and their purchase being authorized. There are some things the purchase of which is authorized and for which appropriations are made annually. But if the Senator will look at the rules—and I myself would have to examine them to find the particular rule—he will find that the rule is perfectly clear that when an appropriation bill is brought before the Senate, if there is not authority for the appropriation, on the motion of any Senator the bill can be sent back to the Committee on Appropriations. The reason for that is that the committee must have authority to provide for expenditures. Here we are proposing an expenditure, not of a small sum, but of $300,000,000, and we regard it as so important that the chairman of the committee, I am happy to say, has already stated that he is willing to accept an amendment providing a limitation upon the profits which may come from building this large, unusual, almost, I might say, unexpected, number of airplanes that have to be built. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that it is very essential that we should observe every precaution to see that we do not authorize more money than should be expended.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the amendment now pending is a committee amendment increasing the number of planes from 5,500 to 6,000, but the debate has gone far beyond that, and Senators have been discussing a proposed amendment which someone will offer later to limit the amount of money which may be expended in the construction and maintenance of the 6,000 planes.

As I stated a while ago, I intend to vote for the provision for 6,000 planes. It may be ridiculous to contend that we can get 6,000 planes for practically the same price for which we can get 5,500 planes. I do not know whether or not that is absolutely correct. However, it can be based upon the theory of mass production, by reason of which wholesalers all over the United States sell larger quantities in carload lots and in trainload lots to consumers or retailers than any retailer himself could buy a small proportion.

In business we always recognize the theory of mass production, and the larger the quantity of any product bought by a customer or a purchaser the smaller is the cost per unit. That is a well-recognized business practice in this country. And if the airplane factories knew that in the consummation of this program the Government would buy 6,000 instead of 5,500 planes it is entirely possible that the Government could get 6,000 for approximately the same price it would have to pay for 5,500.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask the chairman of the committee a question on that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Where did the figure 5,500 come from?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It came from a calculation made by the War Department as to the average number of planes they could maintain under a 6,000 authorization.

Mr. LEE. Where did our committee get the 6,000 figure? Did some member of our committee invent it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not at all. As I have said, the War Department's plan was for a maximum authorization of 6,000 planes, in order that they might be able to maintain an average number of planes of all kinds of approximately 5,500. The bills which the War Department first sent down, both to the House and to the Senate, contained the maximum of 6,000.

Mr. LEE. Then the War Department itself asked us for a bill that contained the figure 6,000? Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is correct.

Mr. LEE. Did both bills, the bill that came to the House and the bill that came to the Senate committee have the 6,000 figure?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They both had the 6,000 maximum.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have here a copy of the House bill, introduced on the 18th of January, nearly a month before the bill we are now considering passed the House.

Mr. LEE. I am quite familiar with it. I was asking the question to bring out the fact, so that every one could understand, that the figure 5,500 was not the figure given us originally by the War Department. They gave us the 6,000 figure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. As a maximum.

Mr. LEE. But they did say that in order that they might have at least 5,500, we would have to fix the ceiling or maximum of 6,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct.

Mr. LEE. If we fix the ceiling at 5,500 it is very possible that the number will fall somewhat below that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That would be the result.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the bill provides for a maximum of serviceable planes. As was said a while ago, the bill as originally introduced, which was recommended by the War Department, provided for 6,000 planes. The theory of that 6,000 ceiling was that at all times after the ships have been constructed and are in service there would be an average of 5,500 serviceable planes always in the service.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEE. The chairman of the committee is authority for saying that the vote in the committee was almost unanimous. The Senators were not polled, but the feeling was that the vote was almost unanimous. We did not originate the figure. We simply restored the 6,000 figure after the House had cut it down by 500.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct.

Mr. LEE. So it was not a fictitious figure, as was suggested on the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. No. I am not on the Military Affairs Committee, and I cannot speak for what happened there; but it is my understanding, received from members of the committee, that what actually happened there was that the committee restored the original number of planes asked for by the War Department and carried in the original bill introduced as the result of the Department's recommendation. How unanimous the vote was in the committee I do not know, and it may or may not be material, but the number originally asked was put in the bill by the committee, and no one on the committee filed a minority report objecting. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has made a speech on the subject, and a very able one, as he always does, but there was no minority report made by any member of the committee.

Mr. LEE. I believe that at no time during the offering of all the testimony before the committee was the figure of 5,500 mentioned as being adequate. Each time it was referred to as "this program." It is easily understandable that the experts from the War Department had in mind the program recommended originally by the War Department, which provided for a 6,000 maximum.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it is fair so to assume. There is nothing in the record that I have been able to find—and I have read the Senate hearings and part of the House hearings—which shows that the War Department or any officers of the War Department specifically yielded or retraced their steps down hill from the 6,000 figure they originally recommended in order to provide an average of 5,500 serviceable planes in service all the time.

It is not before the Senate at the moment, but, inasmuch as it has been discussed, I think I may with propriety refer to the naval construction bill that was passed last year providing for a vast increase in the naval armament of the United States. That bill provided for certain ships of various types and categories. It was signed by the President on the 17th day of May 1938.

That bill provided for a certain maximum of ships to be added to a program that was adopted in 1934. There is not a word in the bill passed less than a year ago which provided for an increase of the Navy, about a limitation of cost on the ships, or the number of ships which might be constructed under the naval program. So that it is not accurate to say that it has been the universal practice to put a limitation on the cost of equipment of this sort, that is to be spread over a period of years. If we knew that we could get these things built within a month or 60 days, or even 6 months, we might feel safer in undertaking to fix the cost limit, but the program is going to take 2 years, and it may take longer, depending on the amount of money made available by Congress and the facilities and the speed with which these airplanes may be manufactured. I think, therefore, that we are not required by any precedent to say, "We want 6,000 ships, but in order to get them we are going to limit the Department to $170,000,000 both for construction and maintenance and equipment and personnel and all that." It might very easily develop that we could neither construct nor maintain those ships with such an amount of money, and if we get them, and they are needed, Congress, I think, will be able to take care from year to year of the amount necessary to maintain them and put them into service.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true, as I have sought previously to make clear, that when we are buying equipment that has to be replaced constantly and from time to time, we do not follow the procedure of putting any definite amount of money in the authorization?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. HILL. I called that to the attention of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar].

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is correct. I think we have to rely on the Appropriations Committee and the War Department as to what is needed to carry out the program from year to year. I think the War Department has not deviated from the appropriation in the past. Therefore, there should be no fear that they will go outside the appropriations and spend a half a billion dollars or a billion dollars in any one year and then come to Congress and ask for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. HILL. No Senator in the debate has cited a concrete example of the Navy or the War Department doing such a thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there are two departments in the Government which have been meticulous about staying within the limits of their appropriations they are the War Department and the Navy Department.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I believe the question now is on the first committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; that is correct. The clerk will state the pending committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, the committee proposes to strike out "five thousand and five hundred" and to insert the words "six thousand."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	Lewis	Reed
Ashurst	Ellender	Lodge	Reynolds
Austin	Frazier	Logan	Russell
Bailey	George	Lucas	Schwartz
Bankhead	Gerry	Lundeen	Schwellenbach
Barbour	Gibson	McCarran	Sheppard
Barkley	Green	McKellar	Shipstead
Bilbo	Guffey	McNary	Smathers
Bone	Gurney	Maloney	Taft
Brown	Harrison	Mead	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Hatch	Miller	Thomas, Utah
Burke	Hayden	Minton	Tobey
Byrd	Herring	Murray	Townsend

Clark, Mo.	Johnson, Colo.	Overton	Wheeler
Connally	King	Pepper	White
Danaher	La Follette	Pittman	Wiley
Davis	Lee	Radcliffe

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may the amendment be restated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "five thousand and five hundred" and insert "six thousand."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that amendment the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass]. I am not informed how he would vote, so I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McKellar (when Mr. Stewart's name was called). The junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Stewart] is absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. Hale] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gillette]. If present, the Senator from Maine would vote "yea," and the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay."

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Stewart]. If present, the Senator from Idaho would vote "nay," and the Senator from Tennessee would vote "yea."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. Capper] with the Senator from California [Mr. Downey]. If present, the Senator from Kansas would vote "nay," and the Senator from California would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. Downey], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gillette], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Holt], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] are detained from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Stewart] is absent on important public business.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. Andrews] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings] are engaged in conference in Government departments and are unable to be present for the vote.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] is unavoidably detained.

I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Holt] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is in a conference at the Department of Justice with the Attorney General. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—54

Ashurst	Gerry	Lodge	Reynolds
Austin	Gibson	Logan	Russell
Bailey	Green	Lucas	Schwartz

NOT VOTING—14

Andrews	Downey	Holt	Tydings
Borah	Gillette	Shipstead	Walsh
Bridges	Glass	Smith
Capper	Hale	Stewart

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 1, before the word "officers", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve"; in line 3, after the word "thousand", to strike out "Reserve officers of" and insert "reserve officers in"; in line 5, after the word "thousand", to strike out "Reserve officers of" and insert "reserve officers in"; in line 7, after the word "hundred", to strike out "Reserve officers of" and insert "reserve officers in"; in line 10, after the word "such", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve"; in line 12, after the word "of" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Air Corps Reserve officers" and insert "reserve officers of the Air Corps"; in line 22, after the word "any", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve"; in line 24, after the word "any", to strike out "Reserve Corps" and insert "reserve," so as to read:

SEC. 5. Section 1 of the act entitled "An act to amend the National Defense Act," approved August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1028), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That the President is hereby authorized to call annually, with their consent, upon application to and selection by the War Department, for a period of not more than 1 year for any one officer, for active duty with the Regular Army, such numbers of reserve officers in the grade of second lieutenant, as are necessary to maintain on active duty at all times not more than 1,000 reserve officers in the promotion-list branches other than the Air Corps, not more than 3,000 reserve officers in the Air Corps, and not more than 300 reserve officers in the non-promotion-list branches: Provided, That in the non-promotion-list branches and the Judge Advocate General's Department, such reserve officers may be in any grade not above captain: Provided further, That until July 1, 1949, the tour of active duty of reserve officers of the Air Corps may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be extended not to exceed a total of 7 years' active service in all, and thereafter not to exceed a total of 5 years' active service in all: Provided further, That in the non-promotion-list branches and the Judge Advocate General's Department, the tour of active duty may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be extended not to exceed a total of 2 years' active service in all: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall require the termination of active duty of any reserve officer because of promotion to a higher grade after his tour of active duty begins. The tour of any reserve officer on active duty may be terminated at any time, in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 2, after the word "all", to strike out "officers (including warrant officers) and all" and insert "officers, warrant officers, and."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to make some inquiries of the Senator from Texas concerning the amendment at the top of page 6, and also another one in lines 12 and 16 which have not as yet been read. As amended by the committee, the proviso at top of page 6 reads:

Provided further, That all officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army of the United States.

The Senate committee has stricken out language in the House bill which reads as follows:

officers (including warrant officers) and all National Guard, Reserve Corps, or any other armed forces of the United States, however designated.

What is the reason for the change of the language in this provision?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The language recommended by the Senate committee merely expresses the same idea in another way.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment now under consideration is an amendment changing the language of the House bill, which provides—

That all officers (including warrant officers) and all enlisted men of the National Guard, Reserve Corps, or any other armed forces of the United States, however designated, other than the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, if called into the active military service by the Federal Government for extended military service in excess of 30 days, and suffer disability or death in line of duty from disease or injury while so employed, shall be deemed to have been in the active military service during such period and shall be in all respects—

That is all really one provision.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is all one provision.

Mr. BARKLEY. At that point the committee has stricken out the words:

upon the same footing as to pensions, compensation, retirement pay, and hospital benefits as—

And inserted the words:

entitled to receive the same pensions, compensation, retirement pay, and hospital benefits as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for—

Followed by the words of the House bill:

officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service of the Regular Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senate committee has not changed the meaning of the text as it came from the House. It is merely a more appropriate way of expressing the intent of the text.

Mr. BARKLEY. Assuming that the changes made in the language by the Senate committee are merely technical and simply, in another way, describe the men referred to in the House bill—

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is a correct interpretation.

Mr. BARKLEY. What change does that make in existing law with respect to the men covered by this paragraph?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator mean what change does the House text make in the existing law?

Mr. BARKLEY. Both the House and the Senate text.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senate committee did not change the virtual meaning of the House text. The effect of the House text was to permit National Guard and Reserve officers and enlisted men in both of these components, when called into active military service, to have the same pension benefits—retirement benefits, pay benefits when wounded or disabled or killed—as are possessed by their brothers in the Regular Army fighting by their side.

Mr. McKELLAR. Ought not that to be done?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senate committee thought that it should be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. The language of the House text is:

National Guard, Reserve Corps, or any other armed forces of the United States, however designated.

Is not that more inclusive? A great many members of the National Guard believe that the provision as proposed by the Senate committee will eliminate them if they are called into the Army. That may not be so; but if it was not intended by the committee to exclude the National Guard, the Reserve Corps, or any other armed forces, why not say so in the bill, so that there may be no doubt about it? It seems to me the language of the House bill is all-inclusive and cannot be misunderstood. It ought not to be misunderstood, because if the men of the National Guard take part in a war in the Army of the United States they ought to be treated exactly the same way that officers and men of the Regular Army are treated. That has been the case heretofore. So I believe that the amendment should be voted down and the House language retained in the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The representative of the National Guard who came before the committee suggested the amendment, and this was concurred in by the other witnesses.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator another question. I am seeking information, because I am told by representatives of the War Department that this provision will apply to Reserve officers who have not been in active service, but who have been called by the Federal Government into service, for instance, in the Civilian Conservation Corps camps. I am informed there are about 5,000 Reserve officers now serving in the Civilian Conservation Corps camps as superintendents, directors, and what not, and that all of them were drawn from civil life. While they were Reserve officers they were not serving in the Army; they had no direct connection with the Army except that they were Reserve officers subject to call. They were engaged in their ordinary civilian activities. They may have been merchants, lawyers, railroad men, or engaged in any other occupation. They were probably not only not serving in the Army at the time but it may be that some of them were unemployed, but as Reserve officers, to the number of about 5,000, they have been called into active service to take charge of Civilian Conservation Corps camps somewhere in the United States.

I have also been told that the inclusion of this provision would result in the discharge of men who are Reserve officers and who are now serving in the Civilian Conservation Corps camps, an employment which they desired, an employment which they sought, an employment which carries with it no particular hazard; and that if this provision should be included in the law, they would be entitled while serving in these camps to the same compensation, the same longevity pay, the same retirement privileges accorded to officers of the Regular Army if they should become injured in any way while rendering service in these camps or if they became incapacitated by reason of illness; and that the cost of reemploying outside of the Reserve officers other men qualified to be in charge of these camps would be somewhat increased over what is now the outlay. Can the Senator inform us about that; because these questions that I am asking have been raised by representatives of the War Department? They are, frankly, very much disturbed about this provision. The estimate cost has gone as high as $50,000,000, and they say they have no idea how much it may be. Can the Senator enlighten the Senate about that?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Whatever a Regular Army officer would get in the service of a C. C. C. camp the National Guard officers and Reserve officers would get under this measure. However, those who sponsored this amendment, the Disabled Veterans' Association, the American Legion, and the National Guard Association, all dispute the contention of the Department. The Department is not in favor of this measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am trying to get information.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand. Let me add that these officers are detailed for duty with the C. C. C. under an arrangement by which the C. C. C. bears all the expenses of such officers, such as pay, travel, and so forth.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that is true, but suppose they are called into active service, the C. C. C. has no authority over them. The War Department calls them into service as Reserve officers, and they are assigned to these camps. If it turns out that while in one of these camps they are injured by an automobile accident, by the falling of a tree or in any other way, in line of their duty, they would be entitled, under this provision, to the same benefits as if they were serving in the Army, in an Army camp, or even on the field of battle. Is that true?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They would have the same benefits that a Regular Army officer would have if he were employed in the C. C. C.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; not if he were employed in the C. C. C.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to call the attention of my colleague to the fact that the language of the bill itself—and I may say this provision received most careful consideration at the hands of the committee; it was considered almost line by line—merely provides—

Provided further, That all officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army of the United States, other than the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, if called or ordered into the active military service by the Federal Government for extended military service in excess of 30 days—

And so forth. Service in the C. C. C. is not military service—

Mr. BARKLEY. It may not be.

Mr. LOGAN. And they are not called into the military service when they are sent to C. C. C. camps.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a member of the National Guard or Reserve officer who has become a Reserve officer either by graduation at West Point, or by serving a period in the Army, or by going through an aviation school in Texas or elsewhere, is called into the actual military service in time of war or insurrection or other dangerous situation, where he will be subject to the same sort of service and liable to the same sort of injury to which an officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army might be subject, I do not think the fact that he was called into the service, and not a part of the Regular Army, ought to deprive him of receiving the same amount of compensation that the Regular Army officer or enlisted man would receive for injuries received in battle, or in any other military activity. I am wondering, however, whether the use of the words "military service" might not include the service to which I have made reference, because the man would not be called to that service except for the fact that he is a Reserve officer of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. But a Reserve officer may be called into something that is not active military service, and certainly assigning him to a C. C. C. camp would not be assigning him to active military service. If, however, he should be called from a C. C. C. camp, not because he was connected with it but because he was a Reserve officer, and then he had active military service for more than 30 days, if his service extended that long, he would be entitled to exactly the same benefits to which any Regular Army officer would be entitled if he received an injury or death resulting directly from the service; and that is what that provision means.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let me ask a question. Originally a man had to be in service 90 days before he became entitled to a pension or compensation?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. That period was reduced to 75 days, and I think that is now the law. If the period has been reduced below that number of days, I do not know it. Does this language mean that these men would be entitled to these privileges after 30 days' service in the Army?

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no!

Mr. BARKLEY. Does it change the 75-day period?

Mr. LOGAN. What the provision was largely intended for, as I understood, was this: The National Guard is called into active military service once a year, usually for only 15 days; but when its officers are called into active military service at the camps, and serve there for as much as 30 days, and receive injuries, they are entitled to just the same privileges to which Regular Army officers are entitled.

That is about the only thing the provision does. Under the present law National Guard officers are not so entitled, and they do have injuries and deaths, for which they or their dependents receive nothing. This provision was intended largely to take care of Reserve officers who are called into active military service and serve for 30 days in one period, or officers of the National Guard when called into the active military service. There is no provision now by which officers who are called for temporary service may receive anything in case of injury.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the case of a war in which the Army is engaged in military activities on the battlefield or in training, is it the law that members of the National Guard of the various States drawn into the United States Army and becoming a part of it are not now entitled or would not be entitled to compensation in case of injury in battle, or their dependents to compensation in case of death in active military service in a war? That is not now the law, as I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not so sure about that. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, as we know, all the National Guard contingents in the country were drawn into the United States Army during the World War.

Mr. LOGAN. They became a part of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. They became a part of it. After that occurs, if there is a war and they are injured in battle, or if they are injured by reason of exposure or any other reason that would disable a soldier, are they not now entitled to compensation, pensions, hospitalization, and other things such as anybody in the Regular Army would be entitled to?

Mr. LOGAN. When they become a part of the Army by being called into the service, I think that is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, if this matter was discussed before the committee, and is the Senator of the opinion, and was the committee of the opinion, that the language as changed by the committee is just as inclusive of the National Guard and Reserve Corps, or any of the other armed forces of the United States, as is the House language?

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that that is true. The language was very carefully considered, and the Senate committee reached the conclusion that the language it had incorporated in the bill expressed the purpose more clearly than the House language.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator from Kentucky himself is fully convinced that that is true?

Mr. LOGAN. Absolutely. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take the Senator's word for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, the Senator construes this language not as going any further than the House language, but as being better and more appropriate language?

Mr. LOGAN. Absolutely. My colleague is right.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish merely to make a brief observation. When an officer of the Reserve Corps is sent to a C. C. C. camp now, he is called back to active service and is assigned to the C. C. C. camp. I apprehend that the primary purpose and the only point at issue in this amendment arises with respect to officers of the National Guard and Reserve officers when they are called into actual service, or any of the other units having officers called into actual service during an emergency, during a war period; the real point of controversy being the same old point that arose over the emergency officers' retirement privilege.

We had that conflict here in the Senate. We finally gave to the emergency officers of the World War, the same, or substantially the same, retirement benefits that were given to the officers of the Regular Army. Immediately after the war the same benefits were given to the emergency officers in the Navy and in the Marine Corps. They were denied to emergency officers of the Army for some years, until the bill came along known as the Tyson bill. I was at that time a member of the Military Affairs Committee. We then gave to the emergency officers of the World War retirement benefits.

As I understand, the National Guard is a part of the armed force of the country. It is a Federal force, but only in the sense that in actual wartime, when called into actual service, it is given all the privileges of the other part of the force. But I desire to say now that if one of the Reserve officers called back into actual service is assigned to a C. C. C. camp and suffers a disability he may be compensated. The National Guard officers have some kind of compensation, but it is not the same compensation that is given to the officers of the Regular Army; nor would the National Guard officers or the Reserve officers called into actual service in wartime have the benefit of retiring as Regular Army officers unless this amendment should be adopted.

The whole point of this controversy is the same point that arose when the Senate some years ago established once and for all, I hope, the public policy of regarding our emergency officers as regular officers of the Army if in actual duty, and in line of duty, they suffered a disability which entitled them to retirement benefits. That, Mr. President, as I understand, is the purport of this amendment and is substantially the whole effect of the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. That being true, then an officer of any National Guard organization called into what is called training service once a year, for 2 weeks or 3 weeks, would not be entitled to any compensation or any of the privileges provided in this section. He would not be entitled to compensation for injury unless he was in the service or in that training camp for at least 30 days. In other words, if a National Guard officer at Fort Knox, Ky., for instance, is injured in the course of the annual maneuvers for 21 or 27 days, he does not have any of these privileges at all; but if he is there for 31 days, he does. Is that the effect of this amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not understand that to be the effect of this particular amendment so far as the National Guard officers are concerned. It may be. There are present members of the Military Affairs Committee who are better qualified than I am to speak on that subject.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is provided that these privileges shall accrue whenever officers are drawn into the service for a period of more than 30 days, which would seem to carry the implication that unless they are drawn into the service for at least that much time they will not obtain any of these privileges if they are injured in the line of their duty in these camps.

Senators are familiar with the fact that every year the National Guard assemble at various forts, and go through maneuvers, and go through rather intensive training.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; for about 2 weeks.

Mr. BARKLEY. For about 2 weeks. Of course, if the officers are there for only 2 weeks, they cannot come in under this provision; but if they are there for more than 30 days, they can.

Mr. GEORGE. Probably that is true, if that is regarded as part of the active duty, if they are in active service during that period.

Mr. BARKLEY. If such men are entitled to longevity, for instance, because of being in the service for more than 30 days, or if they are entitled to compensation for the loss of a limb in some military activity in these training camps or maneuvers after 30 days, would there really be any equity in denying compensation to a man similarly injured who had been there only 2 weeks and was injured under the same circumstances?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think it is the practice of the Army not to permit these maneuvers or training to be conducted for as long a period as 30 days.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not prepared to speak with respect to the National Guard officers; but I think I can safely say that if Reserve officers were called back into active service, they then would be entitled to all the retirement benefits accorded to the officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the Senator interpret this language to mean that if a Reserve officer, who has been a Reserve officer, we will say, for years, is called back into active service and assigned to a Civilian Conservation camp, he is in active military service as if there were an emergency?

Mr. GEORGE. I think he is in active service, and if he suffers disability arising in line of duty, he is entitled to compensation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Although his work there is connected with a civilian activity and is not essentially military?

Mr. GEORGE. I think so, unless by contract with the Civilian Conservation Corps he is taken out of that class.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise only in connection with what was said by the Senator from Tennessee. Since this matter has been pending, I have received a number of letters from National Guard and Reserve officers in camps. All of them, if I correctly interpret their attitude, prefer the language of the bill as reported by the Senate committee. They have referred to their preference for the separate handling of the National Guard and the Reserve officers' situation with relation to the Regular Army matter as reported by the committee in the bill, and therefore I am for the amendment of the committee in this respect.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The record shows that the language as it went into the bill in the House was inserted after being rather hastily drafted. It was not maturely considered, or not written with a great deal of care. The House committee had no hearings on the provision at all.

The language having been inserted in the bill under those circumstances, when the bill came to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that committee proceeded to hold hearings in order to make sure that the language would do what was sought to be done. As a result the Senate Committee on Military Affairs had before it Maj. Gen. Milton A. Reckford, the spokesman of the National Guard Association of the United States; Col. John Thomas Taylor, of the American Legion; Col. Millard W. Rice, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; and Mr. L. S. Ray, representing the Disabled Emergency Officers organization. It was after hearing these gentlemen, and after considering the House language with considerable care, that the Senate committee decided to amend the language of the House bill. For that reason the Senate committee brings this amendment to the floor of the Senate today, because the language of the Senate committee amendment has been carefully considered, and has been carefully worked out, whereas, as I have stated, the House language was not carefully drafted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. REED. I yield the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the Senator from Alabama if it is not a fact that there is no substantial dispute between the House and the Senate as to this provision? The only dispute is between the House and the Senate, on the one hand, and the War Department, on the other, which is opposed to the whole proposition? The War Department is opposed to it exactly in the same way that it was opposed to putting emergency officers who were permanently disabled during the World War on the same footing with Regular Army officers. It is the same old controversy; the War Department always opposes any proposal to put on the same footing with enlisted men and officers of the Regular Army men who are not in the Regular Establishment, but who may make the same sacrifices, suffer the same disabilities, and be under the same economic disadvantages.

While I am on my feet, I express the opinion that if there were written into the bill a provision making the appropriation payable through the Veterans' Administration instead of being carried in the War Department appropriation bill, the War Department would withdraw its objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the War Department suggested that if the provision were to be carried in the bill the Department would much prefer to have the administration in the hands of the Veterans' Administration, rather than the War Department. But the Senator from Missouri is absolutely correct in saying that the House of Representatives and the Senate Committee on Military Affairs are in full and complete accord and agreement as to the purposes and the ends sought by this provision in the bill.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs believes that, having given the language greater consideration, and having had hearings, the provision has been more carefully worked out, and I think that the author of the House language, Representative EDMISTON, of West Virginia, in his appearance before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, made it very clear that he was not sure that the House language was drawn just as it should have been, and that what he was seeking was to get the provision in the bill in the best possible language.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call attention to the fact that a while ago I was asked whether members of the National Guard receive the same benefits, when they are called into the armed forces of the United States in time of war, as do members of the Regular Army. I think I stated that they did. But the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a few minutes ago is correct; they do not receive the same benefits.

Mr. HILL. The difference between a Reserve officer and an officer of the National Guard is simply that a Reserve officer holds a reserve commission in the Army of the United States. The Army of the United States, of course, is the Federal Army. An officer of the National Guard holds a commission in the National Guard of the State of which he happens to be a citizen, and the National Guard is simply the State militia.

Under the present law the National Guard does not become a part of the Army of the United States, does not come into the Federal service, until and unless it is called in by the President of the United States when the Congress of the United States has declared a state of war or a state of emergency to exist. We have to bear that in mind. A Reserve officer is an officer of the United States. A National Guard officer is an officer of a State. That is why there is some difference between what a Reserve officer of the Federal Army receives and what an officer of the State National Guard receives.

Mr. McKELLAR. When he is called into the service of the United States he is entitled to the same pay.

Mr. HILL. When he enters the Federal Army, of course, he gets exactly the same treatment every other officer in the Army receives.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Missouri that the real bone of contention here is over who shall administer this provision—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me correct the Senator. I did not say that. I stated it was the same old dispute, that there was no dispute between the Senate and the House, but that the War Department is objecting to putting emergency officers, or temporary officers, or Reserve officers, or National Guard officers, whatever they may be called, on the same footing with officers of the Regular Establishment when they suffer similar injuries. I would venture the statement on my own responsibility that if the whole charge on the Government by this amendment were transferred from the War Department appropriations to the Veterans' Bureau, the War Department would not be in nearly such great opposition. What I said was that it was a dispute, not between the Senate and the House, but between both the Senate and the House and the War Department.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that, but I thought the Senator said that if the administration of the amendment were changed from the War Department to the Veterans' Bureau, the War Department would withdraw its opposition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was merely an observation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether or not the Senator was speaking by the card, but if that be true, and Congress desires to adopt this as a policy for the future, what objection would there be to transferring the administration of the provision to the Veterans' Administration? The Veterans' Administration administers all other pension laws. I am not advocating it, but if that is an objection which would be composed by the transfer, what would be the objection to the transfer?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One objection may be illustrated by what a man in Missouri said, that a bird in the hand is the noblest work of God. I know that unless we included the men in the Reserve Corps and the men in the National Guard by a provision in a bill that was not going to be vetoed by the President of the United States, the War Department would go over and get him to veto a separate measure containing such a provision.

Mr. BARKLEY. I never make any prediction about vetoes, but I do not see that there would be any material difference in the manner in which this would be administered if it were in one department rather than in another.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is the difference between getting it and not getting it.

Mr. HILL. I think I can give the Senator a better answer, perhaps, with all apologies to the Senator from Missouri. The reason why this should be in the War Department rather than in the Veterans' Administration is that these men will be examined by Army doctors when they leave the Army. Whether they leave because their time is up, or whether they leave because of some injury or disability, they will be examined by Army doctors, who will be the ones to pass on whether or not they have disabilities, and, if so, the nature of the disabilities. That being the case, I believe it is better to have the War Department administer the provision than for these men to leave the Army and then perhaps come back weeks or months afterward to be examined by some doctor of the Veterans' Administration.

One other brief point, and I will take my seat. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky, I believe, suggested that the present law contains a provision whereby an officer or enlisted man had to be in the service 75 days, originally 90 days, before he could draw compensation.

As the distinguished Senator from Kentucky knows, we have two different types of compensation for what we may call disability payments. One is what we generally call disability compensation, which a man draws because of a direct service-connected disability. In that case there is no requirement as to any length of service, 75 days or 90 days. If the man went into the service and on the first day suffered an injury in line of duty, because of his being in the service, he would get disability compensation.

We also have, on the other hand, the non-service-connected compensation, or as we call it, allowance. That is paid when a man who served in the Army incurs some disability, we will say, today, but is unable to prove that his disability is directly caused by his service. In that case he has to show that he was in the Army some 75 days. What is provided in the bill is only for injury and disability that is service connected. So the 75- or 90-day requirement would not apply or be a precedent in that case.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am familiar with that difference between service-connected and non-service-connected requirements. Is it the Senator's contention and belief that the language of the amendment does not in any way affect the existing difference between non-service-connected and service-connected disabilities?

Mr. HILL. I do not think the language affects it. As I read and construe the language it applies only to what we term a service-connected disability.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether or not he agrees with the Senator from Georgia with respect to the question that was asked concerning a Reserve officer who is called into active service for duty in a C. C. C. camp, who, after staying in the camp for a period of 30 days or more is injured. In such a case would he receive the same benefits in the way of pensions or compensation as are provided by the law for Regular officers?

Mr. HILL. I heard the answer made by the Senator from Georgia and thought I agreed with him until I read the language of the bill, which says "into the active military service by the Federal Government." I cannot honestly answer the Senator's question. I do not know whether or not a Reserve officer who is called to a C. C. C. camp would be held to be in the active military service. I want to be perfectly candid and say that, of course, the language in the bill had in contemplation service other than C. C. C. service, because the bill does not in any way affect or touch the C. C. C.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask the Senator if he can tell me under whose authority or jurisdiction a Reserve officer is who is called back into the service for work in a C. C. C. camp?

Mr. HILL. I would say that that Reserve officer is under the jurisdiction of the commanding general of the particular corps area in which he happens to be serving.

Mr. LUCAS. Through what fund does he get his pay?

Mr. HILL. I am not sure whether he gets his pay from a War Department fund or from a C. C. C. fund; and not being sure, I will not hazard a guess. I am quite sure that he is under the command and direction of the commanding general of his corps area, but from which fund his pay comes I cannot say. Perhaps some other member of the committee can give the Senator that information.

Mr. LUCAS. In view of what seems to be a disagreement between members of the committee as well as other Members of the Senate as to that very important question, I should think the committee would want that matter cleared up.

Mr. HILL. On the question of difference between Members, I wish to say that the Senator must bear in mind that the bill in no way whatever deals with the C. C. C. It does not make any provision for the C. C. C. It does not have anything at all to do with the C. C. C.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate that.

Mr. HILL. For that reason perhaps the committee did not go into the question of the C. C. C., as it would have done had the bill anything to do with the C. C. C., which it does not.

Mr. LUCAS. But one very distinguished Senator—he is not only a very distinguished Senator but a very able lawyer—says he believes that under the amendment an individual who is called from the Reserve Corps into a C. C. C. camp and serves there over a period of 30 days, and then becomes injured is subject to the provisions of the measure. A moment ago the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] referred to statements by officers of the Army that probably $50,000,000 might be involved in connection with this very provision. The Senator from Alabama now says that he does not believe the provision will apply to a Reserve officer in a situation of that kind, because assignment to a C. C. C. camp cannot be considered as active military service. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Alabama, but his view is in direct conflict with the opinion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL. I am delighted to know that the very able and distinguished Senator who has just spoken agrees with me. I do not think C. C. C. service would be construed to be active military service, and, unless it is so construed, officers on duty with the C. C. C. would not come in under the provision.

Mr. BARKLEY. Have the President or the War Department authority to call back Reserve officers for anything but military service?

Mr. HILL. The Senator uses the word "call", and that might be subject to several constructions. As the Senator knows, there are many more applicants than there are places. The distinguished Senator has heard the old saying, "Many are called, but few are chosen." There are many applicants, but not all are chosen.

Mr. BARKLEY. But whenever a Reserve officer finds himself in charge of a C. C. C. camp he is both called and chosen. The question I asked is whether the Federal Government—the President or Secretary of War—have any authority to call him for any service except a military service, and if they cannot call him for any other service, and they do call him for service in a C. C. C. camp, may it not be military service?

Mr. HILL. It may be.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I confess that this discussion, which usually clarifies questions, has not, so far as I am concerned, made very clear the obligation resting upon the Federal Government with respect to officers who may be called to serve in C. C. C. camps. It seems to me that before the bill leaves the Senate that matter ought to be distinctly and definitely determined.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama that the bill is one which does not directly, at any rate, deal with C. C. C. camps. Nevertheless, it is conceded that Reserve officers are called into the respective C. C. C. camps. Some may be lieutenants. Perhaps they are excluded. Certainly captains and perhaps officers of higher rank are called for service in C. C. C. camps. We ought to know what is the obligation of the Federal Government; whether such officers are to be paid out of the C. C. C. fund or whether they are to be paid by the War Department, or whether they come under the jurisdiction of the organization that deals with pensions and disabilities. It seems to me there should be an amendment which would make that matter clear before we finally act on the bill.

I do not know now what is the obligation of the Federal Government. I do not know whether the C. C. C. camp officers are called out under the authority of the President of the United States, or by the President of the United States, or by some corps commander, nor do I know the duties and obligations resting upon them; whether they are independent of the Army discipline, or dependent solely upon the contract which they may enter into with the C. C. C. authority.

I wish those in charge of the bill would make that matter clear, at least to my understanding, so that there would be no misconception as to interpretation of the obligation which ultimately must rest upon the Treasury of the United States. Until that matter is cleared, I should feel obliged to vote against the measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not desire to prolong the discussion, but I wish to call the attention of the members of the Military Affairs Committee to one matter. Of course, if the amendment is left in the bill it will go to conference; but the conferees cannot go beyond the limits of the language contained in the bill in order to clear it up. The reason I have been somewhat anxious about the matter is that many Reserve officers who are in charge of civilian conservation camps have not been called to any kind of service for years, and many more are applicants for these jobs than have been provided with them. It is a job to many of them who have been unemployed, and by reason of their status as Reserve officers they have been given preference in the distribution of these positions.

I do not consider superintendency over a C. C. C. camp to be as desirable and as worthy or as being in the same category with military service in the field of battle or in a camp. The language ought to be clarified. If the present language remains in the bill it may mean the discharge of the 5,000—if that is the number—Reserve officers who have sought these places and been appointed to them because they meant jobs to them.

They may not be on the same basis with the National Guard, who are called to a training camp once a year; but, in order to avoid an interpretation which would include them in the privileges accruing to the military service, and involve the expense that would follow the interpretation that they are in military service, the Department might have to discharge all of them and employ civilians in their places. That would be an unfortunate thing for the camps and also for these men.

If the amendment is agreed to, I hope the Senator from Texas, when the bill gets into conference, may find someone to clarify that language, so there will be no misunderstanding of what it means.

Mr. KING. I may add to what I said a while ago that I shall be disposed to vote against the bill for several reasons, among others the matter under discussion, unless it is clearly determined what are the obligations of the Federal Government. I should be unwilling to vote for an amendment which would place 5,000 Reserve officers who have sought and obtained positions in the various camps, in the same category as military officers, and which would give them the same disability benefits and pension benefits that are enjoyed by men who are giving their lives to the military service of the United States.

If A, a Reserve officer, who has served only a few months, and perhaps has never been overseas, is now assigned to one of these camps, and there sustains a disability, I feel that it would be unfair to place him in the same category and give him all the benefits enjoyed by men who are giving their lives to the Army, and who suffer disabilities in line of duty in the Army. I think this question ought to be clarified by a proper amendment before the bill leaves the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield the floor.

Mr. MINTON. I do not know whether or not my statement will add anything to the sum total of our knowledge on the subject. However, I asked the War Department about the relationship of the Reserve officers to the C. C. C. camps. The office of the Chief of Staff advises me that Reserve officers are called into service by the War Department, but they are paid from C. C. C. funds, which are handled by the War Department acting as the fiscal agent for the C. C. C. camps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 6, line 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 3, after the word "the", to strike out "National Guard, Reserve Corps, or any other armed forces of the United States, however designated" and insert "Army of the United States"; in line 6, after the word "called", to insert "or ordered"; in line 8, after the word "and" to insert "who"; in line 10, before the word "shall", to strike out the comma and "they"; and in line 12, after the word "respects", to strike out "upon the same footing as to pensions, compensation, retirement pay, and hospital benefits as" and insert "entitled to receive the same pensions, compensation, retirement pay, and hospital benefits as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for", so as to make the section read:

Provided further, That all officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States, other than the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, if called or ordered into the active military service by the Federal Government for extended military service in excess of 30 days, and who suffer disability or death in line of duty from disease or injury while so employed, shall be deemed to have been in the active military service during such period and shall be in all respects entitled to receive the same pensions, compensation, retirement pay, and hospital benefits as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service of the Regular Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 17, after the word "active", to strike out "duty," and insert "duty"; in line 19, after the name "Air Corps Training Center", to insert "except that such officers now commissioned in or to be commissioned in the Air Corps, Regular Army, under the provisions of this act shall be commissioned as otherwise herein provided"; in line 23, before the word "from", to insert "from Reserve officers and"; on page 8, line 6, after the word "thirty", to strike out "years:" and insert "years; except as herein provided. Those officers who are commissioned in or to be commissioned in the Air Corps, United States Army, shall be given constructive service for all duties served by them as Reserve officers or cadets, serving as such, in the Air Corps after graduation from the Air Corps Training Center: Provided, That this constructive service will count to the credit of such Reserve officers when so commissioned for pay purposes, longevity, and position on the promotion list: Provided further, That no officer so commissioned in the Air Corps will exceed the legal age limit, as established by this act, by a period of time greater than the amount of constructive service so awarded: Provided further, That this provision shall only apply to officers in the grade of first and second lieutenants now commissioned in or who may be commissioned in the Air Corps:"; on page 9, line 5, before the word "officers", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve"; in line 14, after the word "among", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve"; and in line 20, before the word "judge", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. Section 24e of the National Defense Act, as amended (41 Stat. 774), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Except as otherwise herein provided, all appointments in the Regular Army shall be made in the grade of second lieutenant from the following groups: Group 1, from graduates of the United States Military Academy; group 2, from warrant officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army who have had at least 2 years' service; group 3, from honor graduates of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; group 4, from members of the Officers' Reserve Corps and flying cadets, who have completed not less than 1 year's active duty under the provisions of this act, which duty may include service as a flying cadet in the Air Corps Training Center; except that such officers now commissioned in or to be commissioned in the Air Corps, Regular Army, under the provisions of this act shall be commissioned as otherwise herein provided and group 5, from reserve officers and from officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the National Guard, members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and graduates of technical institutions approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That, after all qualified members of group 1 have been appointed, appointments from the second, third, fourth, and fifth groups shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, from persons between the ages of 21 and 30 years; except as herein provided. Those officers who are commissioned in or to be commissioned in the Air Corps, United States Army, shall be given constructive service for all duties served by them as reserve officers or cadets, serving as such, in the Air Corps after graduation from the Air Corps Training Center: Provided, That this constructive service will count to the credit of such reserve officers when so commissioned for pay purposes, longevity, and position on the promotion list: Provided further, That no officer so commissioned in the Air Corps will exceed the legal age limit, as established by this act, by a period of time greater than the amount of constructive service so awarded: Provided further, That this provision shall only apply to officers in the grade of first and second lieutenants now commissioned in or who may be commissioned in the Air Corps: Provided further, That the number to be selected from each of the second, third, fourth, and fifth groups, and the number to be assigned to each branch of the service within the limits prescribed by law from all groups shall be determined by the Secretary of War in his discretion: Provided further, That until June 30, 1949, the total number of officers to be appointed annually from group 4, not including flying cadets, in the promotion list branches other than the Air Corps shall be not less than 10 percent of the total number of reserve officers of such branches other than the Air Corps authorized to be called annually under appropriation acts, and in no event less than 50, and that any officer added to the Army under existing authorizations shall be within the total authorized commissioned strength of 16,719: And provided further, That immediately upon the effective date of this act, the President is authorized to commission not to exceed 300 second lieutenants in the Air Corps of the Regular Army, from among reserve officers and flying cadets who have qualified for such appointment under existing laws. Any vacancy in the grade of captain in the Judge Advocate General's Department, not filled by transfer or detail from another branch, may, in the discretion of the President, be filled by appointment from reserve judge advocates between the ages of 30 and 36 years, and such appointee shall be placed upon the promotion list immediately below the junior captain on said list. Appointments in the Medical, Dental, and Veterinary Corps in the grade of first lieutenant shall be made from Reserve Medical, Dental, and Veterinary officers, respectively, between the ages of 23 and 32 years. Appointments in the Medical Administrative Corps shall be made in the grade of second lieutenant from pharmacists between the ages of 21 and 32 years who are graduates of recognized schools or colleges of pharmacy requiring 4 years of instruction for graduation, under such regulations and after such examination as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. To be eligible for appointment in the Dental Corps, a candidate must be a graduate of a recognized dental college, and have been engaged in the practice of his profession for at least 2 years subsequent to graduation. Appointments as chaplain shall be made from persons duly accredited by some religious denomination or organization, and of good standing therein, between the ages of 23 and 45 years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 12, after the word "of", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve"; in line 15, before the word "who", to strike out "Air Corps Reserve officers" and insert "reserve officers of the Air Corps"; in line 19, after the word "no", to strike out "Air Corps Reserve officers" and insert "reserve officers of the Air Corps"; and in line 23, after the word "of", to strike out "Reserve" and insert "reserve", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect the operation of the act of August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1028), with respect to the selection and commissioning, in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of that act, of reserve officers now on active duty under the provisions of that act. Upon the effective date of this act, reserve officers of the Air Corps who are then on active duty under the provisions of section 1 of the act of June 16, 1936 (49 Stat. 1524), shall be deemed to be on active duty under the provisions of this act: Provided, That on and after the effective date of this act no reserve officers of the Air Corps shall be called to active duty under the provision of section 1 of the said act of June 16, 1936. Except as otherwise herein provided, nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect the number of reserve officers that may be called to active duty under existing laws, nor the conditions and the purposes for which they may be called.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 7, after the word "thereunder", to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That for the purposes of this act educational orders shall not be considered as contracts for public work or works or for the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, articles, and equipment.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That section 4 of the act approved June 16, 1938, entitled "An act to provide for placing educational orders to familiarize private manufacturing establishments with the production of munitions of war of special or technical design, noncommercial in character", be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That funds appropriated to accomplish the purposes of this act shall be available for expenditures incidental to the accomplishment of the procurements made thereunder, including production studies, factory plans, and other production data and the storage and maintenance of gages, dies, jigs, tools, fixtures, and other special aids and appliances procured thereunder: Provided, That for the purposes of this act educational orders shall not be considered as contracts for public work or works or for the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, articles, and equipment. To carry out the provisions of this act there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $34,500,000, which amount shall be available during the fiscal years 1939, 1940, and 1941, and there is further authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 during each of the 4 fiscal years succeeding the fiscal year 1941."

MR. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Texas, on behalf of the committee, will propose to withdraw that amendment.

MR. SHEPPARD. After consulting with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], I have concluded to withdraw that amendment.

MR. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that I shall be glad to see the amendment withdrawn, because it would work an injustice.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

MR. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there will probably be several amendments offered from the floor. It is obvious that we cannot finish the consideration of the bill this afternoon. Therefore, I suggest that we suspend at this point.

MR. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

THE LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 3, after the word "thereof" and the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

And there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for such purpose an amount not exceeding $300,000,000.

MR. MCKELLAR. I ask that my amendment may be printed and lie on the table until tomorrow.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE LATE SENATOR ROBINSON, OF ARKANSAS

MR. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 93, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 93) submitted by Mrs. CARAWAY on March 3, 1939, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, with an illustration, and bound for the use of the Joint Committee on Printing, 1,000 additional copies of the volume of memorial addresses delivered or presented in the Senate and House of Representatives on the life and character of Hon. Joseph Taylor Robinson, late a Senator from Arkansas.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL HEARINGS FOR TEMPORARY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the resolution?

Mr. HAYDEN. The resolution merely authorizes the Temporary National Economic Committee to print additional copies of the testimony taken before the committee, as is customary with such committees.

Mr. McNARY. It is customary?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3), submitted by Mr. O'MAHONEY on February 6, 1939, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Temporary National Economic Committee of the Congress be, and is hereby, empowered to procure the printing of 5,000 additional copies of part 1 and each subsequent part of the hearings held before the said committee, who are directed by Public Resolution No. 113, approved June 16, 1938, to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to the concentration of economic power in, and financial control over, production and distribution of goods and services.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a treaty, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Charles E. Clark, of Connecticut, to be judge of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, to fill an existing vacancy.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for promotion in the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported favorably the nomination of Richard H. Rutledge, of Utah, to be Director of Grazing, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate, vice Farrington R. Carpenter, resigned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further committee reports, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Army nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That concludes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 7, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 6, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, a strange sense of calm comes over us as we wait at the altar of prayer. Here may we gather the fairest, the gladdest, and the holiest memories of the soul. Grant us love without stain, vision of the truth unveiled, and assurance of Thy shelter and care. We love life; while it is very brief, it is very sacred and very grand because it is the merciful gift of a good God. May we esteem time so highly that not a day shall pass without reflecting some of Heaven's goodness. May we dread to walk in green pastures with no sense of their richness, stand under the skies with no eye for their majesty, or hear the invisible voices with no ear for their sweetness. We pray that Thy manifold mercies may be the urge of our sacrifice. Oh, may our homes remind us of the homeless, our bread of the hungry, our friends of the solitary, and our paths of the footsore and weary. Thou who art in the briefest flower and in the smallest star, hear our humble prayer. In the holy name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Friday, March 3, 1939, and of Saturday, March 4, 1939, were read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 316) entitled "An act to authorize and direct the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to reappoint David R. Thompson and Ralph S. Warner as members of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. KING, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. CAPPER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution adopted by the Senate of Alabama, memorializing the Congress to take all consistent steps to avoid entrance into any foreign war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a speech made by our colleague, Hon. THOMAS V. SMITH, regarding Sam Houston, made at the recent Texas Independence State dinner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement recently made before the Ways and Means Committee in reference to national old-age pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject The Farm Chemurgic Movement and the Permanent Solution of Our Farm Surplus.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE SOIL CONSERVATION ACT

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a little time this afternoon to call your attention to a bill I have introduced in the House to amend the present Soil Conservation Act. This amendment provides a more equitable adjustment in the payment of the money appropriated under our soil-conservation law. I also want to call your attention to the manner in which a large part of the funds allotted under the act have been distributed.

I think it is generally admitted by those who have had experience with this act that soil conservation payments, after all, are nothing more or less than subsidies to help the farmers. These payments do help the farmer conserve his soil; but, more especially, as this money is paid to the ordinary, average farmer it helps him to take care of his obligations temporarily until such time as he can have a price for his products which favorably compare with the price he has to pay for the things he buys. These payments also help him a little in the event of crop failures. I do not think the soil-conservation program, as such, has reduced the surplus of our crops materially. There are so many other factors that affect the situation.

Here are some comparative figures showing the manner in which these funds have been distributed. They are of more than ordinary interest, I believe, to the Members of Congress:

Under the 1937 program 3,657,496 farmers and landowners received benefits. The Department of Agriculture advises that the total amount of expenditures for the Soil Conservation Service in 1937 amounted to approximately $359,000,000. The figures for 1938 will be about the same, or probably a little less. Of the $359,000,000, $315,500,000 was spent in payments to farmers and farm operators and $43,600,000 for administration expenses.

If the $315,500,000 were evenly distributed to those who complied with the soil-conservation plan, the average payment would be approximately $100.

But here are some figures to which I want to direct your particular attention: Out of 3,657,000 farmers, 1,091,540, or almost one-third of them, received less than $20 each. There were 773,000 who received between $20 and $40 each, 500,000 who received between $40 and $60 each, and 556,000 who got between $60 and $100.

If the one-third of all farmers who received less than $20 annually averaged as much as $15 each—and that is a liberal estimate—$15,000,000 would pay their bill.

If the 774,000 farmers who received between $20 and $40 each received an average of $30, $22,000,000 would have paid their contracts.

Then as to the 500,000 farmers who got less than $60—if they received an average of $50 each—$25,000,000 would pay them.

Then we have 556,000 farmers who received between $60 and $100. If their average payment was $80—and this is liberal—they would receive $44,480,000.

In other words, with $107,000,000 we have paid approximately 3,000,000 farmers. Or, putting it another way, 80 percent of all the farmers received less than one-half of the funds allocated to the farmers and farm operators. Just think of it, only a comparatively few of the 3,000,000 farmers got as much as $100. As a matter of fact, they received an average of less than $50 each.

Furthermore, it took approximately $18,000,000 to pay the administration expenses in Washington and in the States, and it took $26,000,000 for county expenses, making a total of $44,000,000 for administering the fund.

This was more money than was actually paid to 1,800,000 farmers, being more than half of those who participated in the program, and who got less than $40 each. These farmers received thirty-eight and one-half million dollars, and it took $44,000,000 to administer the fund.

After deducting the $107,000,000 which was paid to the 3,000,000 farmers, we have a balance, in round figures, of $208,000,000, which we assume was divided among the remaining one-fifth of the farmers.

So it would appear that the remaining one-fifth of those who took part in this program in 1937 received approximately $200,000,000, or two-thirds of the amount actually distributed in soil-conservation payments.

I have introduced in the House H. R. 4753. It is a twofold amendment to the present act. It provided, in the first place, for just a little larger payment to the farmer who operates a small, average farm, and who is getting a small share of the total amount appropriated by Congress.

The other part of the amendment limits the total payments to anyone within a State to $1,500. Under this measure, the farmer who gets $25 under the present law would receive approximately $31. If he receives $35 now, under the amendment he would get $45. If he receives $50 at this time, he would get $63. If he gets as much as $60 under the present law, it would be increased to $76. If he receives $100 now, he would then receive approximately $115 under the amendment.

It gives the farmer who receives small payments a better break than he had before. It ought to be more. We hear a lot about the "forgotten man." I have come to the conclusion that the forgotten man is the farmer who tries to take care of his family on one of our ordinary, average farms. We take care of the big operator all right but we have certainly forgotten the small, independent farmers. We have to do more than we have done in the past to encourage the home owner and the man who operates the small-sized farm, because after all he has been and is the bulwark of this country. We must do something more constructive than we have done before to prevent the increase of farm tenancy in this country. Do you realize that we have some 2,800,000 farm tenants? Forty-two percent of our farmers are tenants. We need more farm owners and fewer tenants. One of our great statesmen once said, "No man ever shouldered a musket to defend a boarding house." And he was right.

The second portion of the amendment prevents the large operators from receiving large subsidies that they have not really earned, and who really do not need them. I think we have come to a place where we should give a little more attention and encouragement to the man who operates what may be known as the "family sized farm" and less assistance to the big operator, who regards the soil-conservation money as just that much "velvet."

Under this measure I am making an effort to provide a little more liberal payment to the fellow who actually needs it and really earns the money and reducing the amount that is made payable to the large operator or corporation, which not only does not need it but will also prevent the encouragement of large-scale, commercialized "bonanza" farming.

I should call your attention to something else: The large operator and small operator alike receive subsidies of 2 cents per pound for cotton, 11 cents per bushel for wheat, and 6 cents per bushel for corn. In view of this situation, the large operator should not have any complaint as to this measure.

I do not think the farmer really wants to be paid a subsidy for operating his own farm. He ought to have the first right to supply the American market just as far as he can do it on a reasonable basis.

I know the agricultural problem is a difficult one to solve, and I want to give due credit to those who have made an honest endeavor to do something about it. But have not we sought to destroy the overabundance of food and restrict production—to the extent that even in 1937 we imported into the United States of America food for our people that our own farmers could have produced? We brought into this country agricultural products that would have required the planting and harvesting of between fifteen and twenty million acres of our own farm lands. It is a shame and a disgrace that we have millions of people in our country, one-third of them, we are told, that are hungry, ill-housed and ill-clothed, and we have the food supply of the world—yet millions of people are going hungry.

We need to have more confidence in each other. We should have more confidence in our Government—the greatest in all the world. We should produce more things instead of less. It is not only unfortunate but it is a criticism on our democracy that we are permitting millions of men to remain without employment who, if employed, would provide a purchasing power which to a great extent would solve the so-called surplus of our Commonwealth.

Help the farmer? Certainly. But let us help him to help himself. Let us get these men back to work so far as we can. Let us give the American farmer the first chance at the American market. And let me repeat that in my opinion it is not so much a question of overproduction that we have in this country, but, rather, a problem of maldistribution and underconsumption.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short article on Denver's opportunity school.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD four memorials from the Legislature of the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a short article from the Oregonian on gasoline taxes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement by the Brookings Institution on reorganization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point and to insert therein a clipping from the Minneapolis Journal and one from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

A HEART-RENDING SIGHT—AMERICA'S FUTURE

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last we gathered here with the Senate and the executive and judicial departments of this Nation to join in a dramatic tribute to the Nation's First Congress and to a century and a half of free government under a constitution, and we pledged, together with all Americans, a continuance of that historical ideal.

I sometimes wonder if we know the essential elements of its perpetuation and if we, either as Government officials in high places or as individual citizens, are willing to count the cost and play the game as it needs to be and as it was played by those hallowed, mighty, and saintly souls who so well laid the foundation and paid the cost in the early years of our history?

From that foundation we still reap the benefits, but what of the future, the future which is under our guidance and control? When I read today's history as contained in our daily press, and from it consider tomorrow's trends, I am fearful for democracy.

Take, for instance, the following clipping from a daily paper just sent me by a Mrs. H. C. Olsen, of Lindstrom, Minn., and consider that its picture and counterpart is to be found today, tonight, in every city throughout the length and breadth of the land.

HEART-RENDING SIGHT

To the EDITOR:

Sunday night about midnight I with a number of other young people visited a club west of the city limits and while there we counted over 75 children, who, according to our best judgment, were between the ages of 12 and 18, and apparently all were in various stages of intoxication and indulging in actions usual in a drunken brawl.

It was the most heart-rending sight I ever witnessed in any club or public place and I understand similar conditions exist there every Sunday night.

It was so disgusting we only remained a short time, and as we left a young girl whom we judged not over 12 years of age fell inside the exit and was unable to regain her feet without help. * * *

ANN SMITH.

George Washington once said on the occasion of a speech that—

It has always been a source of serious regret to me to see youth contracting too frequently habits of dissipation and extravagance, principles unfriendly to republican government.

We are wont to refer with great gusto and approbation to the remarks of the Father of his Country on foreign policy, but we forget that he was also equally astute on matters of internal welfare, as indicated by the above quotation; and we forget, too, that if we are to justify our title of statesman it is our duty to give thought and service to this great problem of human welfare and of this Nation's future, built upon its children of today.

Senator SHEPPARD, on the Senate side, has been trying to stir up interest on the part of overworked lawmakers to the need for action, and I hope we will bestir ourselves on this side of the Capitol to this great need.

The totalitarian nations have their defects, but we must admit they seem to be taking the lead in cleaning up such problems. In Germany Adolf Hitler says:

The bad state lets its young people degenerate in the streets and brothels.

He says:

We must seek to beget images of the Lord, who created all good things, including human beings, and not monstrosities halfway between man and ape.

In order to prepare that nation for world leadership and dominance a national abstinence drive has been instituted, which includes tobacco as well as liquor. The Associated Press reports this great forward stride, as follows:

GERMAN YOUTH URGED TO SHUN DRINK, SMOKES—LEADERSHIP TELLS NATION TO FOLLOW HITLER'S EXAMPLE

BERLIN, March 3.—The Nazi leadership today called on German youth to assume a new national duty—abstinence from alcohol and tobacco in emulation of Reichsfuehrer Hitler.

Opening a campaign against intoxicants and smoking, Youth Leader Baldur von Schirach and other orators held up the Fuehrer, who neither drinks nor smokes, as the example for all good Nazis.

Under the auspices of the national health department of the Nazi Party a congress is to meet at Frankfurt-on-Main Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday to consider the topic of Public Health and Harmful Indulgences.

More than 14,000 health officials and others have been notified to attend to hear speeches by Dr. Gerhard Wagner, leader of the organized medical profession, and others.

TWELVE COMMANDMENTS LISTED

As the drive started, a ban on pushing the sale of cigars and cigarettes was imposed by the Nazi-organized restaurant and refreshment trades in their own establishments.

Twelve commandments were listed by the Nazis to back a slogan urging wholesome life as a national duty. These objectives were:

Abstinence of youth from alcohol and tobacco.

Abstinence of pregnant and nursing mothers; abstemiousness by those endangered by either alcohol or tobacco.

Alcoholic abstinence, whenever carrying special responsibilities, such as driving an auto, severe punishment to be imposed for alcoholic offenses.

Control of alcohol and tobacco advertising by a German business council in close cooperation with Nazi leaders.

Prohibition of advertising that promotes alcohol or tobacco as beneficial to health or useful in preventing disease.

CAMPAIGN PROPOSED

Establishment of public restaurants which do not serve alcoholic drinks.

Increase in manufacture of nonalcoholic drinks at low prices.

Promotion of scientific experiments on nonalcoholic drinks.

A publicity campaign on the nature of alcohol, the misuse of tobacco, and their dangers to the people and the race.

Education of youths in wholesome conduct as a national duty.

Physical exercise for the entire nation.

Is that program not a challenge to us? Will America be able to withstand the Fascist, Nazi, Communist competition which sound, healthy minds and bodies are bound to give us, if we continue our present indifference? What are we Congressmen going to do about it? Speaking of the members of the German Reichstag before 1933 Hitler said "Those parliament ganders produced more honking nonsense in one session than a whole dynasty of emperors." We are accused of having plenty of the same honking nonsense here, but we can write plenty of accomplishment, too, if we like, and the liquor and tobacco problem presents a great opportunity for constructive effort.

And in Russia—Russia was the first Christian country to adopt complete and nation-wide prohibition. As early as July 1914 the sale of intoxicating liquor was forbidden. Lenin said, when taking over the government in November 1917, "To permit the sale of vodka would mean a backward step. We have other industries to rebuild much more important than distilleries." True it was necessary to relax this attitude starting in 1921, the same as we had to give up the prohibition amendment in America, but the Russian Communist Government is no less against the use of liquor today than in 1917 and an extensive educational campaign against it was begun in 1929 and has been aggressively promoted ever since, although under the State monopoly there are still 7,000 liquor stores operated and at a very large revenue or profit to the Soviet Union. However, before the war in 1914, there were 25,733 liquor stores.

To the Communist, the elimination of liquor and its evils is a part of their governmental philosophy and therefore will always be made an integral part of the building of a better life for that nation according to their ideas.

In terms of this competition, what is America's future? Shall America drag behind or will her leaders take a stand for reform? It is long overdue and if we are to lead the world as has been our boast in generations past, or even hold our own, we will need to do some checking up, for our native white stock is going down hill fast, if we are to judge from our present-day athletic records. Consider who are our champions. Who is the champion heavyweight boxer, the champion light-heavy, the champion middleweight? Who are our best football and basketball players? The fastest track star?

This is not just accident. It is, however, a real indication of the recessionary stage of our native white citizenry. Another indication of our weak physical fiber is the fact that records show that not more than 20 percent of our people are maximally healthy. Insurance companies reject many applicants and the record is said to show that not over 40 percent can pass a satisfactory physical examination for life insurance.

What is the cause of all this, and to what shall we look for the reason? Perhaps Hitler and Stalin are not so dumb. Perhaps we should do a little introspective searching of ourselves. Do you suppose any of our decadence could be traced to the world-beating, if undesirable, records, which we are setting up every year for liquor consumption and cigarette smoking?

The French nation has been in a decadent state for years, undoubtedly from the same causes. They would have been defeated in 1917 had we not come to their aid, and similarly is the case of the English. I noticed when in France that you could hardly get a glass of water or of milk to drink. The common practice is to drink wine or other liquors and to smoke cigarettes, and one who drinks water or milk is almost an outcast.

Again today we find France surrounded by her more virile, more aggressive neighbors and she is well on the road to partial if not complete abdication to them. Napoleon, Lafayette, and other French leaders of ages past would turn over in their graves, if they could see the depths to which France has let herself down by her physical, mental, and moral degradation.

What should we do about it as an American problem? Here in the District of Columbia a move is on foot to supplant retail liquor stores with Government dispensaries. That this would be a good start in general is indicated by a comparison between Pennsylvania and the District of Columbia. The State has one dispensary for every 35,000 residents and nets $37,000,000 in annual revenue on $100,000,000 gross business, while the District gets only $1,900,000 in taxes from a $50,000,000 gross business with one liquor store for every 1,400 residents. Quite some comparison, is it not?

We do a lot of talking about the public health—we introduce bills in Congress and we appropriate money to build better health for American citizens. Then we turn around and throw it all away in dissipation. How large a percentage of us are habitually poisoning ourselves—no one knows—but without a doubt it is very large. Yet so perfect is the human machine that even though we are too indifferent to its welfare to go more than 1 percent of the way, nature going the other 99 percent, because a gracious Creator has endowed our bodies with marvelous ability to repair injuries and correct parts burned out by the poison from liquor and tobacco, thus we can keep on for a time in a way. But how much we lose in efficiency, in health, in attainment, and in our reserve of power and strength needed to go the extra mile of service if we are to justify our existence and to develop the 1 or the 10 talents we all are given, is a question which each individual must in the final day of reckoning answer for himself and herself. In God's name, and in the name of the future of America and of democracy, let us as individuals do some serious thinking on this subject, and let us, if we are statesmen, here in Congress take an immediate, firm, and corrective stand for the solution of this great problem which I have outlined for your patriotic consideration.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
March 4, 1939.

The Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,

Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the act of May 17, 1928 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1052-a), I have appointed during the remainder of the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress the following members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House as members of the Board of Visitors of the United States Military Academy: Hon. A. J. MAY, Kentucky; Hon. R. EWING THOMASON, Texas; Hon. DOW W. HARTER, Ohio; Hon. CHARLES I. FADDIS, Pennsylvania; Hon. WALTER G. ANDREWS, New York; Hon. DEWEY SHORT, Missouri; Hon. L. C. ARENDSE, Illinois.

Very sincerely yours,

A. J. MAY, Chairman.

COMMUNICATION FROM CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES, FRANCE

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

THE PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES,
Paris, March 4, 1939.

To the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,

Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington:

On the occasion of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the first session of the Congress of the United States, I pray you to convey to the House of Representatives the homage of the Chamber of Deputies for that elder first legislative assembly of a great nation, whose birth in liberty was so close to that of France, and in whose War of Independence it will be our continual pride to have shared. The Deputies of France pray their American colleagues to accept the assurance of the profound sentiments of friendship which unite them in a common and fervent love of justice and of the liberty of the peoples.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. Today is Consent Calendar Day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN LAWS (POCKET VETOED)

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3233) to repeal certain acts of Congress (pocket vetoed).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, or someone on the Committee on the Judiciary, if this legislation is really necessary? The Supreme Court in the case known as the Pocket Veto case, cited in Two Hundred and Seventy-ninth United States Reports, page 655, has held that under these conditions a bill does not become a law, and a study of the case cited in the report does not convince me that there is any danger that the laws referred to in this bill might become laws.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I think, in the interest of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who at present is not in the Chamber, it might be well, and unless the gentleman has objection, to have the bill passed over without prejudice, and thus defer the answer to the question the gentleman has asked. Does the gentleman intend to object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No. I think the bill is harmless, but I would like to have some points cleared up. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LXXXIV—145

AMENDING AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1938

The Clerk called the bill (S. 660) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide for the reapportionment of cotton acreage allotments not planted by farmers entitled thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I understand that some amendments are to be offered to the bill by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, of course, I cannot offer the amendments until the bill is read.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman intends to offer such an amendment?

Mr. NICHOLS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (h) of section 344 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out the words "for the crop year 1938", and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for any crop year"; and by striking out the words "for 1938" where they appear in the first proviso of such subsection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NICHOLS: Line 8, after the word "subsection", strike out the period, insert a semicolon and the following: "Provided, That hereafter such allotment of acreage in counties shall be to such farms as the county committee of such county may designate. In making such designation the county committee shall consider only the character and adaptability of the soil and other physical facilities affecting the production of cotton and the need of operator for an additional allotment to meet the requirement of the families engaging in the production of cotton on the farm in such year."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman if the term "committee" is defined, to remove any ambiguity concerning what committee is contemplated?

Mr. JONES of Texas. "County committee" is thoroughly defined, and the method of setting it up is provided for in the regular bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3800, to amend section 8 (e) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

JURISDICTION OVER COMMERCIAL PRINTS AND LABELS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 153, to transfer jurisdiction over commercial prints and labels, for the purpose of copyright registration, to the Register of Copyrights.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That effective at the close of business June 30, 1939, section 3 of the act entitled "An act to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyrights," approved June 18, 1874 (17 U. S. C. 63), is hereby repealed, but all original or renewal copyrights effected thereunder shall continue in full force and effect for the balance of the respective unexpired terms, subject to all the rights and remedies accorded by existing copyright law.

Sec. 2. That commencing July 1, 1939, the Register of Copyrights is charged with the registration of claims to copyright properly presented, in all prints and labels published in connection with the sale or advertisement of articles of manufacture, including all claims to copyright in prints and labels pending in the Patent Office and uncleared at the close of business June 30, 1939. All such pending applications and all fees which have been submitted or paid to or into the Patent Office for such pending applications, and all trust funds deposited and at the close of business June 30, 1939, held in the Patent Office to be applied to copyright business in that Office, shall be returned by the Commissioner of Patents to the applicants.

SEC. 3. Subsisting copyrights originally registered in the Patent Office prior to July 1, 1939, under the provision of law repealed by section 1 hereof shall be subject to renewal in behalf of the proprietor upon application made to the Register of Copyrights within 1 year prior to the expiration of the original term of 28 years.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. LANHAM: Renumber sections 2 and 3 respectively as sections 3 and 4 and insert the following as section 2:

"Sec. 2. Section 5 (k) of the act entitled 'An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright' approved March 4, 1909, is hereby amended to read: '(k) Prints and pictorial illustrations including prints or labels used for articles of merchandise.'"

And on page 2, line 10, of section 2 as it appears in the printed bill, strike out the word "trust."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AGRARIAN CLAIMS COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 114, authorizing appropriation for expenses of a representative of the United States and of his assistants, and for one-half of the joint expenses of this Government and the Government of Mexico, in giving effect to the agreement of November 9-12, 1938, between the two Governments, providing for the settlement of American claims for damages resulting from expropriations of agrarian properties since August 30, 1927.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENDING FACILITIES OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE TO OFFICERS OF FOREIGN SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3537, to extend the facilities of the United States Public Health Service to active officers of the Foreign Service of the United States.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President, upon recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, any officer of the Foreign Service of the United States who has incurred illness or injury or who has become physically disabled, as a result of service on foreign assignment, and not by reason of vicious habits, intemperance, or misconduct on his part, the cause of such illness or injury to be determined by a duly qualified medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, which determination shall be final when approved by the Surgeon General, shall upon the request of the Secretary of State, be entitled to medical and surgical treatment and hospitalization by the United States Public Health Service at any of its regularly established relief stations and hospitals.

SEC. 2. In order to ascertain at any time the physical fitness of a Foreign Service officer for duty in a foreign station, the United States Public Health Service shall, upon the request of the Secretary of State, subject such Foreign Service officer to a physical examination at any of its established relief stations or hospitals.

SEC. 3. Any officer or American employee of the Foreign Service of the United States suffering from illness or disability not the result of foreign service and any dependent member of the family of any Foreign Service officer or American employee suffering from illness or disability when such illness or disability in any case is not the result of vicious habits, intemperance, or misconduct, the cause of such illness for the purpose hereof to be determined by the United States Public Health Service, may be furnished medical and dental treatment and hospitalization (in the case of dependent members of their families if suitable accommodations are available) by the United States Public Health Service at any of its regularly established relief stations and hospitals at a cost to the officer or employee concerned in accordance with rates established by regulations of the Surgeon General and applicable to pay patients from other branches of the Government service under similar circumstances. Collections by the United States Public Health Service on this account shall be credited to the applicable appropriation for the operation of marine hospitals and relief stations.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLASSIFICATION AND GRADING OF FOREIGN SERVICE PERSONNEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3655, to amend the act entitled "An act for the grading and classification of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States of America, and providing compensation therefor," approved February 23, 1931.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for the grading and classification of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States of America, and providing compensation therefor", approved February 23, 1931, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

Section 3 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized, at posts where in his judgment it is required by the public interests for the purpose of meeting the unusual or excessive costs of living ascertained by him to exist, to grant compensation to clerks assigned there in addition to the basic rates herein specified, and also to other employees in the Foreign Service of the United States who are American citizens in addition to the basic rates of their salaries as fixed by the Secretary of State, within such appropriations as Congress may make for such purpose: Provided, however, That all such additional compensation with the reasons therefor shall be reported to Congress with the annual Budget."

SEC. 2. Section 10 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) That the officers in the Foreign Service shall hereafter be graded and classified as follows, with the salaries of each class herein affixed thereto, except as increases in salaries are authorized in section 33 of this act, but not exceeding in number for each class a proportion of the total number of officers in the Service represented in the following percentage limitations:

"Ambassadors and Ministers as now or hereafter provided; Foreign Service officers as follows: Class 1, 6 percent, $9,000 to $10,000; class 2, 7 percent, $8,000 to $9,000; class 3, 8 percent, $7,000 to $8,000; class 4, 9 percent, $6,000 to $7,000; class 5, 10 percent, $5,000 to $6,000; class 6, 14 percent, $4,500 to $4,900; class 7, $4,000 to $4,400; class 8, $3,500 to $3,900; unclassified, $2,500 to $3,400: Provided, That as many Foreign Service officers above class 6 as may be required for the purpose of inspection may be detailed by the Secretary of State for that purpose.

"(b) That any person appointed an Ambassador or a Minister by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who has taken his oath of office and entered upon his official duties as required by law, may be thereafter transferred in accordance with a subsequent appointment as Ambassador or Minister by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and notwithstanding the provisions of section 1740 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 22, sec. 121), he shall be entitled to be paid salary at the rate prescribed by law for the Ambassador or Minister at the post from which he is transferred to the date he takes oath of office under his new appointment, and thereafter at the rate prescribed by law for the Ambassador or Minister at the new post, including in either case such period as he may be necessarily in transit, traveling under orders, receiving instruction, or on authorized leave of absence, as provided by law for officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States. The taking of his oath by an Ambassador or Minister appointed to a post shall not operate to deprive the retiring Ambassador or Minister at such post of salary up to the date of his departure therefrom, while traveling under orders, during transit to his home in the United States and while on authorized leave of absence as, provided by the law for officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States. Appropriations are hereby authorized to pay salaries in such cases."

SEC. 3. Section 26 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. The President is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for the establishment of a Foreign Service retirement and disability system to be administered under the direction of the Secretary of State and in accordance with the following principles, to wit:

"(a) The Secretary of State shall submit annually a comparative report showing all receipts and disbursements on account of refunds, allowances, and annuities, together with the total number of persons receiving annuities and the amounts paid them, and shall submit annually estimates of appropriations necessary to continue this section in full force and such appropriations are hereby authorized.

"(b) There is hereby created a special fund to be known as the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund.

"(c) Five percent of the basic salary of all Foreign Service officers eligible to retirement shall be contributed to the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed on the date on which this act takes effect to cause such deductions to be made and the sums transferred on the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund for the payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances: Provided, That all basic salaries in excess of $10,000 per annum shall be treated as $10,000 and any Ambassador, Minister, or Foreign Service officer appointed to a position in the Department of State, as provided in paragraph (n) of this section, at a lower basic salary than he was receiving on the date of such appointment shall be considered for all purposes of this section as continuing to draw the higher salary and salary deductions authorized under this paragraph shall be on that basis: And provided further, That any Foreign Service officer may at his option and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President, deposit additional sums in multiples of 1 percent of his basic salary, but not to exceed 10 percent of such basic salary, which amounts together with interest thereon at 3 percent per annum compounded on June 30 of each year, shall, at the date of his retirement, be returned to him in a lump sum; or the officer may elect to use the accumulated amount of his additional deposits and interest to purchase an additional annuity which shall, if he so desires, carry with it a proviso that upon his death a cash benefit shall be paid in such amount as he may elect under regulations to be prescribed by the President, to a beneficiary designated in writing and filed in accordance with instructions of the Secretary of State. The amount of such cash benefit shall not exceed the accumulated amount of the officer's additional deposits with interest to the date of retirement: Provided, however, That in lieu of such cash benefit, the officer may direct that beginning at the time of his death his beneficiary shall be paid a life annuity of such amount as may be purchasable with the amount of the cash benefit and such annuity shall provide for the guaranteed return of at least the amount of the cash benefit. The calculation of the amount of the additional annuity purchasable by the retired officer under the provisions of this option shall be based upon such tables of annuity values as may from time to time be prescribed for this purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury. In case an officer shall become separated from the service for any reason except retirement on an annuity, the amount of any additional deposits with interest at 3 percent per annum compounded annually, made by him under the provisions of this paragraph shall be refunded in the manner provided elsewhere in this section for the return of contributions and interest in the case of death or withdrawal from active service. Any benefits payable to an officer, or to his beneficiary, in respect to the additional deposits provided under this paragraph, shall be in addition to the benefits otherwise provided under this section.

"(d) When any Foreign Service officer has reached the age of 65 years and rendered at least 15 years of service he shall be retired on an annuity computed as prescribed in paragraph (e) of this section: Provided, That any Foreign Service officer who has reached the age of 60 years and rendered at least 30 years of service may be retired at his own request on the annuity computed as prescribed under paragraph (e) of this section: Provided further, That any officer below the age of 60 years who has rendered at least 30 years of actual service, exclusive of extra service credits as provided in paragraph (k) of this section, may be retired at his own request and elect to receive either (1) a deferred annuity beginning at age 60 computed as prescribed under paragraph (e) of this section, or (2) an immediate annuity computed as prescribed under paragraph (e) of this section, reduced by one-fourth of 1 percent of such annuity for each month or major fraction thereof, between the date of his retirement and the sixtieth anniversary of his date of birth: And provided further, That the President may in his discretion retain any such officer on active duty for such period prior to his reaching 70 years of age as he may deem for the interests of the United States.

"(e) The annuity of a retired Foreign Service officer shall be equal to 2 percent of his average annual basic salary for the 10 years next preceding the date of retirement, multiplied by the number of years of service not exceeding 30 years: Provided, That at the time of his retirement a Foreign Service officer, if the husband of a wife to whom he has been married for at least 5 years, may elect to receive a reduced annuity and designate his wife as his beneficiary, to whom will be paid any portion up to two-thirds of his reduced annuity, at the option of the officer, as long as she may live after his death: Provided, however, That the annuity payable to the widow shall in no case exceed 25 percent of the officer's average annual basic salary for the 10 years next preceding the date of retirement. If the age of the officer is less than the age of the wife or exceeds her age by not more than 8 years, the annuity of the officer will be reduced by an amount equal to one-half the annuity which he elects to have paid to his widow. If the age of the officer exceeds the age of the wife by more than 8 years, the annuity of the officer will be reduced by an amount equal to one-half the annuity which he elects to have paid to his widow plus an additional reduction equal to 2 percent of such widow's annuity for each year, or fraction thereof, that the difference in age exceeds 8: Provided further, That a retired officer who is receiving an annuity on the effective date of this act, if the husband of a wife to whom he was married at the time of his retirement and for a total period of at least 5 years, shall be entitled under the same terms and conditions set forth above, to elect to receive a reduced annuity, a portion of which will be continued on his death throughout the life of his surviving widow, but all such elections by retired officers shall be made within 6 months following the effective date of this act, and they shall all be effective on the same date, to be prescribed by the President: And provided further, That no increases in annuities under this act shall operate retroactively and nothing in this act shall be interpreted as reducing the rate of the annuity received by any retired officer on the effective date of this act, unless the officer voluntarily elects to receive a reduced annuity as provided herein.

"(f) In case a Foreign Service officer shall die without having established a valid claim for annuity, the total amount of his deductions with interest thereon at 4 percent per annum compounded on June 30 of each year, except as provided in paragraph (c) of this section, shall be paid upon the establishment of a valid claim therefor in the order of precedence given under paragraph (i) of this section: Provided, however, That if the deceased officer rendered at least 15 years of service and is survived by a widow to whom he was married for at least 5 years, such widow shall be paid an annuity equal to the annuity which she would have been entitled to receive if her husband had been retired on the date of his death, under the provisions of paragraph (j) of this section, and had elected to receive the reduced joint and survivorship annuity, under paragraph (e) hereof, providing the maximum annuity for his widow, unless prior to the date of his death he shall have elected, in lieu of such widow's annuity, and with the approval of the Secretary of State, the return of his deductions with interest as provided in the first part of this paragraph covering officers dying without having established a valid claim for annuity.

"(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to invest from time to time in interest-bearing securities of the United States such portions of the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund as in his judgment may not be immediately required for the payment of annuities, refunds, and allowances, and the income derived from such investments shall constitute a part of said fund.

"(h) None of the moneys mentioned in this section shall be assignable either in law or equity, or be subject to execution, levy, or attachment, garnishment, or other legal process.

"(i) In case the total contributions of the retired officer, exclusive of additional voluntary contributions made under paragraph (c) of this section, together with interest at 4 percent per annum compounded annually up to the date at which annuity payments cease under the terms of the annuity, exceed the annuity payments exclusive of any additional annuity purchased with voluntary contributions made under paragraph (c) hereof, accumulated at the same rate of interest up to such date, the excess of said accumulated contributions over said accumulated annuity payments shall be paid in the following order of precedence, upon the establishment of a valid claim therefor:

"First, to the beneficiary or beneficiaries designated in writing by such annuitant or Foreign Service officer and recorded in compliance with instructions of the Secretary of State, which are hereby authorized;

"Second, if there be no such beneficiary, to the duly appointed executor or administrator of the estate of such annuitant or Foreign Service officer;

"Third, if there be no such beneficiary, or executor or administrator, payment may be made after the expiration of 30 days from the date of the death of the annuitant or Foreign Service officer, to such person or persons as may appear in the judgment of the Secretary of State to be legally entitled thereto, and such payment shall be a bar to recovery by any other person.

"(j) Any Foreign Service officer who, after serving for a total period of not less than 15 years, becomes totally disabled for useful and efficient service by reason of diseases or injury not due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct on his part, shall, upon his own application or upon order of the President, be retired on an annuity under paragraph (e) of this section: Provided, however, That in each case such disability shall be determined by the report of a duly qualified physician or surgeon designated by the Secretary of State to conduct the examination: Provided further, That unless the disability be permanent, a like examination shall be made annually until the annuitant has reached the retirement age as defined in paragraph (d) of this section, and the payment of annuity shall cease from the date of the medical examination showing recovery.

"Fees for examinations under this provision, together with reasonable traveling and other expenses incurred in order to submit to examination, shall be paid out of the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund.

"When the annuity is discontinued under this provision before the annuitant has received a sum equal to the total amount of his contributions, with accrued interest, the difference shall be paid to him or to his legal representatives.

"(k) The President is authorized from time to time to establish, by Executive order, a list of places which by reason of climatic or other extreme conditions are to be classed as unhealthy posts, and each year of duty subsequent to January 1, 1900, at such posts, inclusive of regular leaves of absence, of officers already retired or hereafter retired, shall be counted as 1 year and a half, and so on in like proportion in reckoning the length of service for the purpose of retirement, fractional months being considered as full months in computing such service: Provided, however, That the President may at any time cancel the designation of any place as unhealthy without affecting any credit which has accrued for service at such posts prior to the date of the cancellation.

"(l) Whenever a Foreign Service officer becomes separated from the service before becoming eligible for an annuity, except under section 33 of this act, the total amount of contributions from his salary with interest thereon at 4 percent per annum compounded annually up to the date of such separation, except as provided in paragraph (c) of this section, shall be returned to him.

"(m) The Treasury Department shall prepare the estimates of the annual appropriations required to be made to the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund and to all other similar retirement funds providing annuity benefits to Government employees or to employees of the government of the District of Columbia, and shall make actuarial valuations of such funds at intervals of 5 years, or oftener if deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury:

Provided, however, That in the case of the civil-service retirement and disability fund, the Canal Zone retirement and disability fund, and the Alaska Railroad retirement and disability fund, the required estimates and valuations shall be made by the Treasury Department in accordance with plans and procedures approved by the Board of Actuaries provided for under the provisions of the Civil Service Retirement Act. The Secretary of State is authorized to expend from money to the credit of the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund an amount not exceeding $5,000 per annum for the expenses necessary in carrying out the provisions of this section, including actuarial advice.

"(n) Any diplomatic secretary or consular officer who has been, or any Foreign Service officer who may hereafter be, promoted from the classified service to the grade of Ambassador or Minister, or appointed to a position in the Department of State, shall be entitled to all the benefits of this section in the same manner and under the same conditions as Foreign Service officers: Provided, That any officer now included under the act of May 24, 1924, and the amendment thereto of July 3, 1926, shall be entitled to the benefits of this section.

"(o) For the purposes of this act the period of service shall be computed from the date of original oath of office as diplomatic secretary, consul general, consul, vice consul, deputy consul, consular assistant, consular agent, commercial agent, interpreter, or student interpreter, and shall include periods of service at different times as either a diplomatic or consular officer, or while on assignment to the Department of State, or on special duty or service in another department or establishment of the Government, but all periods of separation from the service and so much of any period of leave of absence without pay as may exceed 6 months shall be excluded: Provided, That service in the Department of State or as clerk in a mission or consulate prior to appointment as a Foreign Service officer may be included in the period of service, in which case the officer shall pay into the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund a special contribution equal to 5 percent of his annual salary for each year of such employment subsequent to July 1, 1924, with interest thereon to date of payment compounded annually at 4 percent."

SEC. 4. Section 33 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 33. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 10 of this act all Foreign Service officers having a rating of satisfactory or better who shall have been in classes 5, 6, 7, or 8 for a continuous period of 9 months or more, shall, on the first day of each fiscal year receive an increase of salary of $100, except that no officer shall receive a salary above the maximum of his class and all such officers in classes 1, 2, 3, or 4 shall in the same circumstances receive an increase of $200: Provided, That the Secretary of State is authorized to fix the salary of Foreign Service officers in the unclassified grade within the salary range specified in section 10 of this act; and, within the limits of appropriation therefor, to grant to Foreign Service officers in any class additional promotion in salary within the salary range established for the classes in which they are serving, based upon especially meritorious service. Increases in salary under the terms of this section shall be paid to Foreign Service officers only as the right to such increases accrues after the effective date of this act. The President is hereby authorized to establish by Executive order, regulations providing for the separation of Foreign Service officers from the Foreign Service, in accordance with the conditions hereinafter prescribed. Any Foreign Service officer so separated from the Foreign Service shall be retired from the Service, after a hearing by the Secretary of State, upon an annuity equal to 25 percent of his salary at the time of retirement, in the case of an officer over 45 years of age, or in the case of an officer under 45 years of age with a bonus of 1 year's salary at the time of his retirement, either annuity or 1 year's salary to be payable out of the Foreign Service retirement and disability fund and except as herein provided, subject to the same provisions and limitations as other annuities payable out of such fund; but no return of contributions shall be made under paragraph (1) of section 26 of this act in the case of any Foreign Service officer retired under the provisions of this section: Provided, however, That any officer entitled to the bonus of 1 year's salary will receive in lieu of such bonus the amount of his contributions and interest under paragraph (1) of section 26 of this act if such amount exceeds 1 year's salary. Whenever it is determined that the efficiency rating of an officer is unsatisfactory, thereby meaning below the standard required for the Service, and such determination has been confirmed by the Secretary of State, the officer shall be notified thereof, and if, after a reasonable period, to be determined by the circumstances in each particular case, the rating of such officer continues to be found unsatisfactory and such finding is confirmed by the Secretary of State after a hearing accorded the officer, such officer shall be separated from the Service with the annuity or bonus provided in this section, but no officer so separated from the Service shall receive the said annuity or bonus unless at the time of separation he shall have served at least 15 years. He shall, however, if he has not served at least 15 years, have returned to him the full sum of his contributions to the annuity fund, with interest thereon at 4 percent compounded annually, except as provided in paragraph (c) of section 4 of this act. The benefits of this section, except, at the option of the Secretary of State, the return of an officer's contributions to the annuity fund, shall not be given to Foreign Service officers separated from the Foreign Service on account of malfeasance in office."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 14, beginning in line 3 after the word "fund", strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 4, 5, and 6 down to and including the word "Columbia."

On page 14, line 7, strike out the word "funds" and insert the word "fund."

Page 14, line 8, after the word "Treasury", strike out the remainder of line 8 and all down to and including the word "act" in line 15.

Page 18, after line 13, insert:

"Sec. 5. This act shall take effect on the first day of the calendar month following the expiration of 60 days from the date of its approval by the President."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 141, to authorize the appropriation of an additional sum of $1,046,000 for Federal participation in the New York World's Fair, 1939.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KRAMER and Mr. GORE objected.

PRIVATE CHARTER OPERATION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2382, to amend section 704 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended, and to amend section 706 (a) of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

PROHIBITING UNAUTHORIZED USE OF NAME OR INSIGNIA OF 4-H CLUBS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 913, to prohibit the unauthorized use of the name or insignia of the 4-H clubs, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person falsely and with intent to defraud to hold himself out as or represent or pretend himself to be a member of, associated with, or an agent or representative for the 4-H clubs, an organization established by the Extension Service of the United States Department of Agriculture and the land-grant colleges, for any purpose whatsoever; or for any person with intent to defraud to wear or display the sign or emblem of said 4-H clubs or any insignia in colorable imitation thereof for the purpose of inducing the belief that he is a member of, associated with, or an agent or representative for said 4-H clubs. It shall be unlawful for any person other than said 4-H clubs and those duly authorized by them, the representatives of the United States Department of Agriculture, the land-grant colleges, and persons authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, to use within the territory of the United States of America and its exterior possessions, for the purpose of trade or as an advertisement to induce the sale of any article whatsoever or for any business or charitable purpose, the recognized emblem of said 4-H clubs, consisting of a green four-leaf clover with stem and the letter H in white or gold on each leaflet, or any sign, insignia, or symbol in colorable imitation thereof, or the words "4-H Club" or "4-H Clubs" or any combination of these or other words or characters in colorable imitation thereof. If any person violates any provision of this act, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $300 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, for each and every offense.

Sec. 2. The term "person" includes individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMEMORATIVE COINS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2750, to prohibit the issuance and coinage of certain commemorative coins, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am in hearty accord with the purposes of the bill.

This question has been before us for a great many years, and I know the temper of the committee in reporting out this legislation. I wonder, however, if by this bill we do what we want to do. This bill provides that subsequent to the enactment of this act, no commemorative coin shall be issued pursuant to any act of Congress authorizing the coinage and issuance of commemorative coins, enacted prior to March 1, 1939. Do we seek under this act to bind future Congresses to this policy which, of course, we cannot do? Under the decisions of the Supreme Court, if we were to pass an act authorizing the coinage of a commemorative 50-cent piece, such an act would become an exception to this general act and would be considered by the courts an exception to this act; and the action of the mint in striking off the coin would be validated regardless of any prohibition in this general act. Will the gentleman from Missouri clarify this situation to the point of admitting that under this bill we do not seek to abrogate the rule against binding future Congresses? That the passage of this act is a declaration of intention only on the part of this particular Congress with respect to coinage of commemorative coins?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Michigan, but it seems to me the wording of this bill absolutely provides that it affects only the authorization of commemorative coins by laws enacted prior to March 1, 1939. Any law dealing with this subject that might be passed subsequently would certainly not be affected in any manner, shape, or form, by the passage of this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If that be the situation, then we are attempting by implication to repeal all acts which have previously been passed with respect to commemorative coins.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think we should have a clear understanding of that. I think during the last session we authorized the striking off of three commemorative coins.

If we want to repeal those acts, why do we not repeal them directly? Is the gentleman of the opinion that this bill will repeal all pending authorizations for the striking off of commemorative coins?

Mr. COCHRAN. That is the purpose of this bill. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan, however, that the commemorative coins authorized by the acts passed in the last Congress have already been issued, in keeping with the provisions of those acts; the celebrations have been held.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is it the gentleman's thought that this bill might preclude this or any subsequent Congress from amending any of the acts which were passed by increasing the number of coins which might be outstanding?

Mr. COCHRAN. I have always been of the opinion that a subsequent Congress could do what it desired. For instance, even if this Congress wanted to repeal this legislation, a week after it became a law, it certainly could do so. I do not think this bill is binding upon future actions of this Congress or of subsequent Congresses.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then we can decide that this is just a declaration of intention as to what we will do with bills, whether introduced at this session or future sessions of Congress; and also the pending bill repeals any existing laws which have not become effective by reason of the coins not having been struck off.

Mr. COCHRAN. Bills pending in the present Congress are not affected by this measure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then it becomes merely a declaration of intention with respect to those bills.

Mr. COCHRAN. This bill is to reach only those that were enacted in previous years where the coins have already been issued.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. COSTELLO. Does not the gentleman think that to reach the situation that is bothering the committee, future bills providing for the striking off of memorial coins should also contain a provision withholding a certain number of the coins from issuance, letting the mint put the additional supply of coins on the market subsequently?

Mr. COCHRAN. I may say to the gentleman from California that the chairman of the committee has already appointed a subcommittee of which the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD] is chairman, to go into that very question. This subcommittee had a conference with the Secretary of the Treasury last week, and I think the subcommittee will report to the full committee in the very near future.

Mr. COSTELLO. I think in order that we may obviate the difficulty we are confronted with, a comprehensive bill should be presented to the Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is exactly what the subcommittee is working on at the moment.

Mr. COSTELLO. I hope the full committee will accept the subcommittee's report.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it not a fact that we have several of these commemorative coin bills pending at the present time? Does the pending bill affect these?

Mr. COCHRAN. We have dozens of bills pending but this bill does not, not in any manner, shape, or form affect those bills.

Mr. REES of Kansas. What does it do, affect only bills introduced previous to this session?

Mr. COCHRAN. Here is what it does: Heretofore acts have been passed providing for the minting of commemorative coins. In some cases authority to mint those coins are now in the hands of distributors. Year by year coins under those acts are minted and sold to the coin collectors. It has developed into a racket. In some instances the coin collectors will charge $10 for a set of three half-dollars. The events for which those commemorative coins were issued have long since been held, but coins have been issued in some instances 15 different times. The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury desire that this practice be stopped, and that is the purpose of this bill. I repeat it does not have anything to do with any bill pending or with any event that is to occur in the future. Pending bills will be taken up by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in the future.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Then it applies only to the earlier acts?

Mr. COCHRAN. Only to acts passed before March 1, 1939.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsequent to the enactment of this act no commemorative coins shall be coined or issued pursuant to any act of Congress, authorizing the coinage and issuance of commemorative coins, enacted prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "to", strike out "the date of the enactment of this act" and insert "March 1, 1939."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TEMPORARY DETAIL OF AMERICAN EMPLOYEES TO AMERICAN REPUBLICS AND THE PHILIPPINES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3134, a bill to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what the purpose of the amendment is wherein it is sought to strike out the language, "whose services can be spared"?

The existing law provides that the President is authorized, when he finds that public interest renders such course advisable, to detail certain scientific, technical, and professional advisers to the Philippine Islands and to the Government of Liberia. The existing law also provides that the President must find that the services of these individuals can be spared.

I found that hidden away in an otherwise desirable law. I wondered why we were relieving the President of the obligation to find that these professional services could be spared by our Government.

Mr. Speaker, I have in mind that this bill directly affects persons with a status similar to that of General McArthur in the Philippines. I see no particular reason why the bill should not be passed, with the exception of the language referred to. As I view this bill now, the President, with or without an agreement to compensate the Federal Government, might detail any number of officers or enlisted men from our Army or Navy or from any other department to the Philippine Islands on the pretense they were there to assist or counsel with the Philippine government.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman asked the question, as I understand it, why these words "can be spared" have been eliminated from the previous bill. This simply means that if some Government bureau here in Washington, say the Department of Agriculture, has an employee that the President desires to detail to some other government for special service, or from the Department of the Interior or any other department, that particular employee can be spared by the Department. That is all it means.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As I understand, the way this law is amended the President does not have to find that he can be spared. He can take any employee out of any department—executive, War, or Navy Department—and send that employee over to the Philippines without any finding whatsoever that that employee can be spared by the Department.

Mr. MAY. No. This simply means he finds that they can be spared.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will have to differ with the gentleman, much as I dislike to do so. The committee recommends that the existing law be amended, and if the gentleman will refer to page 3 of the report wherein under the Ramseyer rule there is set forth changes in existing law, he will see there are some very distinct brackets put around the words "whose services can be spared."

Mr. MAY. That is right.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Indicating that the law is to be amended by striking out those words.

Mr. MAY. That is right. The gentleman is correct. Those words are stricken from the act which we passed last year.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the gentleman think it advisable to remove this restriction from the President's authority to assign these men and officers to Liberia and the Philippines?

Mr. MAY. It is a matter of discretion that the department head usually exercises, and it is a matter that is handled by the department head and approved by the President.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the President concluded it was desirable to send some Navy or Army officers or enlisted men to the Philippine Island, he would not under this existing law have to seek the advice of his department head. He would not have to find that their services could be spared. Exaggerating for the purpose of emphasis I may say he could transfer, under this act, all of the employees of any executive department to the Philippine Islands for any purpose, so long as somebody in the Philippines requested that they be sent over there. If there was danger to the Philippines by reason of a contemplated invasion of any of their political rights or geographic units, I do not want to put the President in a position of having to refuse, on his own responsibility, a request by the Philippine government to send our men and equipment to the Philippines to take care of a pending situation. Unless the committee can give me a much better reason than they have up to the present time for eliminating those words, "whose services can be spared," I am constrained to object.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. The bill does not authorize the President to do this for the Philippine Islands alone. It provides this for any of the American republics. It does not provide only for military aid. I believe such a thing would be helpful and beneficial, not from a military point of view, but from a commercial point of view. It does not mean that we shall send expert military gentlemen over there, but people from the Department of Commerce or the State Department, who will aid the commerce of the United States. I think the more men we can send over there to acquaint the republics with conditions and our desire to do business with them the more beneficial it will be and the Congress of the United States should do that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me read into the Record this very brief law which it is sought to amend.

That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized, whenever he finds that the public interest renders such a course advisable, upon agreement with the government of any other American republic or the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, or the government of Liberia, if such government is desirous of obtaining the services of a person having special scientific or other technical or professional qualifications, other than those persons covered by the act of May 19, 1926 (44 Stat. 565), as amended by the act of May 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 218), to detail for temporary service of not exceeding 1 year, under such government any such person in the employ of the Government of the United States whose services can be spared.

There is no restriction in that act with respect to the number of persons whom the President might send to the American republics, to Liberia, or to the Philippines, except the limitation contained in the words "whose services can be spared." For some reason or other and without too much explanation the committee has recommended that the words "whose services can be spared" be eliminated from the act. Why are they to be eliminated? This is a restriction upon the President's authority to send as many employees of our executive establishment to the Philippines, to Liberia, or to the American republics, as he sees fit. He must first make a finding that they can be spared. This contemplates that the heads of the departments be consulted on the question of whether or not these employees are dispensable. If these words are eliminated, the President may on his own volition without conferring with anyone enter into an agreement, which is easy to obtain, of course, with any of these countries to send as many of the employees of the executive departments, including the Army and the Navy, as he may see fit to any of the countries mentioned in the act. I do not believe the President wants that power, I do not think the President should be given that power, and I do not think I will consent that he be given that power.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3812, granting postal employees credit for Saturday in annual and sick leave law, thereby conforming to the 40-hour workweek or 5-day-week law.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 1 of section 11 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1925, as amended by the act of May 17, 1928 (45 Stat. 595), is amended to read as follows:

"Employees in the Postal Service shall be granted 15 days' leave of absence with pay, exclusive of Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, each fiscal year, and sick leave with pay at the rate of 10 days a year, exclusive of Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, to be cumulative, but no sick leave with pay in excess of six months shall be granted during any one fiscal year. Sick leave shall be granted only upon satisfactory evidence of illness in accordance with the regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 8, strike out "by the act of May 17, 1928 (45 Stat. 595)."

Page 2, after line 8, insert "Sec. 2. This act shall become effective as of February 1, 1939."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THIRD INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS FOR MICROBIOLOGY

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 150) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to provide that the United States extend to foreign governments invitations to participate in the Third International Congress for Microbiology to be held in the United States during the calendar year 1939."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to provide that the United States extend to foreign governments invitations to participate in the Third International Congress for Microbiology to be held in the United States during the calendar year 1939," approved June 25, 1938, is hereby amended by inserting after the word "microbiologists" the following section:

"Sec. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expenses of organizing and holding the Third International Congress for Microbiology, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; communication services; stenographic reporting, translating, and other services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); travel expenses; local transportation; hire of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; transportation of things; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; printing and binding; entertainment; official cards; purchase of newspapers, periodicals, books, and documents; stationery, membership badges, and such other expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of observance of appropriate courtesies in connection therewith, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified."

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COAST GUARD ACADEMY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 136, to authorize contingent expenditures, United States Coast Guard Academy.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $2,500 for any fiscal year, for contingencies for the Superintendent, United States Coast Guard Academy, to be expended in his discretion and by his direction.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 138, to authorize the construction of certain vessels for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Department of Commerce, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt that this bill is meritorious, and I know that it does not add to the number of vessels in the fleet because it replaces an existing outmoded steamer, the Lydonia. However, I believe it is only fair to the Members of the House and the chairmen of the committees of the House that I announce what has been decided upon as a general policy which it is hoped will be observed with respect to the Consent Calendar.

The conclusion has been reached that no bill authorizing the expenditure of a large amount of money—and although we do not see fit to state an arbitrary amount, it is thought that anything over, we will say $750,000, might be considered in that category—should be passed by unanimous consent. The business of the House for the next month or so is not going to be so pressing that we cannot give consideration to these bills. I have always been of the opinion that we should not pass by unanimous-consent bills authorizing the appropriation of large sums of money without some discussion. Every Consent Calendar day is likewise the day on which suspension of the rules may be had. I am sure that if a bill were meritorious the Chair would recognize the chairman of any of the standing committees to suspend the rules and pass the bill. This would at least give us 20 minutes of debate, so that adequate time either under suspension or by a rule may be provided for the discussion of these bills.

In keeping with this policy, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has stated this policy has been formulated. Will the gentleman advise the House who formulated the policy?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; I shall do so.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman also said a conclusion had been reached. Is this the Republican policy or the gentleman's policy?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not speak for the Republican Party.

Mr. McCORMACK. Who has reached this conclusion?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Three of us; the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH], and I have been designated by the Republican leadership to supervise this calendar. On our own responsibility, we have come to the conclusion that a million-dollar bill is too big to be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not taking issue with the policy, or anything of that kind. I simply want the information. The statement of the gentleman in the RECORD would leave the impression that this is the policy of the House, and I wanted to find out for my own benefit just whose policy it is. The gentleman has given me that information.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say at this time that the policy of the three official objectors on the Republican side binds no one else, but I hope by our example it may become the policy of the House.

Mr. BLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to interpose an objection at this time; but if legislative committees want to get their bills through, we will have to ask that the Calendar Wednesday call of committees be regularly made so we can get our bills duly considered according to the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]?

There was no objection.

COAST GUARD STATION, KEWEENAW PENINSULA, MICH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 899, to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station on Grand Traverse Bay, Mich.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the east coast of the Keweenaw Peninsula at or near the vicinity of Grand Traverse Bay, Houghton County, Mich., at such a point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend, and appropriations for the establishment and construction thereof are hereby authorized, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the east coast of the Keweenaw Peninsula, Mich., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

MEDICAL OFFICERS, COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1776, to provide for the assignment of medical officers of the Public Health Service for duty on vessels of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and for other purposes.

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee how many officers will be required to be assigned to these vessels?

Mr. BLAND. I think only a few, and this does not require any additional number. It is simply a means whereby the Public Health Service may be paid for the officers of the Public Health Service detailed to vessels that are doing Coast and Geodetic work up in the waters of Alaska, for instance. These men are assigned to this duty and really have not access to shore, and there are a comparatively small number involved, as I recall.

Mr. SABATH. Approximately, what will be the number of men assigned? They are to be medical men, I understand.

Mr. BLAND. I do not think there are over three or four, but I would not want to make a definite statement.

Mr. SABATH. I think the House ought to know how many of these favorite sons the Department has that they wish to assign in this way, and for that reason I shall be constrained to object until I get more definite information.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman permit me a further statement?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. These men are not favorite sons. They are men who are taken out of the Public Health Service, given these positions; and all this bill does is to enable the Public Health Service to be reimbursed out of the funds of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and therefore there will be no additional charge.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. COSTELLO. At the present time they are only employing four doctors in the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. SABATH. Is that all?

Mr. BLAND. That is all; yes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Treasury may detail medical officers of the United States Public Health Service for duty on vessels of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey and when so detailed the pay and traveling expenses of these officers shall be reimbursed to applicable Public Health Service appropriations.

Sec. 2. Under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, all commissioned officers, ships' officers, and members of the crews of the vessels of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, including those on shore duty and those on detached duty, whether on active duty or retired, and all dependent members of families of such personnel shall be entitled to medical, surgical, and dental treatment and hospitalization by the United States Public Health Service in the same manner and to the same extent as are now or may hereafter be provided by law and regulations for officers and enlisted men of the United States Coast Guard and their dependents. Collections of the Public Health Service for the hospitalization of such dependent members of families shall be credited to the applicable appropriation for the operation of marine hospitals and relief stations.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "pay", insert a comma and the word "allowances."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

METHOD OF COMPUTING ANNUITIES UNDER CANAL ZONE CODE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 139, to amend paragraph (1) of section 96 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code relating to method of computing annuities.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (1) of section 96 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code is amended to read as follows:

"(1) A sum equal to $37.50 multiplied by the number of years of service, not to exceed 30 years, rendered (a) on the Isthmus of Panama, or (b) in the service of the United States in the Tropics; and."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISABILITY RETIREMENT CLAIMS, CANAL ZONE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3577, to amend the Canal Zone Code.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of subsection (b) of section 94 of title 2, Canal Zone Code, as amended by section 2 of the act of June 24, 1936 (49 Stat. 1904), is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any employee to whom this article applies who shall have served for a total period of not less than 5 years, and who, before becoming eligible for retirement under the conditions defined in section 92 of this title, shall have become totally disabled for useful and efficient service in the grade or class of position occupied by the employee, by reason of disease or injury not due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct on the part of the employee, shall upon his own application or upon request or order of the Governor of the Panama Canal, be retired on an annuity computed in accordance with the provisions of section 96 of this title: Provided, That proof of freedom from vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct for a period of more than 5 years next prior to becoming so disabled for useful and efficient service, shall not be required in any case; and the claim of any employee which was or would have been disallowed under this section by reason of the requirement of such proof with respect to a longer period than 5 years, shall upon request of the applicant be reinstated, and shall thereupon be redetermined under the provisions of the section as herein amended: Provided further, That such claim is now on file with the Civil Service Commission or is executed within 6 months from the enactment of this act."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. This concludes the call of the Consent Calendar.

REORGANIZATION BILL OF 1939

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4425) to provide for reorganizing agencies of the Government, and for other purposes. Pending that, I ask the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. I am wondering whether it will be agreeable to the gentleman from New York, when the bill is taken up under the 5-minute rule, to have it read by title rather than by sections.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think we should read the bill by sections. The only difference it makes is this: It would be possible, if the bill were read by title, to close debate on a title after 5 minutes' debate, and there are amendments to sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of part 1, and to section 5 of part 1, and they are very important. It might cause serious confusion and might prevent the House having an opportunity to thoroughly debate the items as they are brought up. With that situation I should hate to see the bill read by titles.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, the request just made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has always come from the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. He has correctly stated the situation. This is being suggested for the benefit of the opposition, if there is any to the bill. It would give the opposition the right to strike out the entire title. It is immaterial to us. We make the suggestion because gentlemen say they are opposed to the bill, and it will give them an opportunity to strike out a title if they desire.

Mr. TABER. The thing that would embarrass me about it would be if the bill were to be read by title and there was to be no opportunity to debate amendments that might be offered. I would like to have an understanding that at least two or three amendments might be offered to sections 2, 3, 4, and 5, and at least one to each of the others, without having the debate close until after 5 minutes had been allotted each side on those amendments all the way through.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, that is a matter entirely up to the Chair. The gentleman has a right to offer amendments. Mr. TABER. We can offer any amendment, but we could not debate the amendments for 5 minutes on a side unless the Committee saw fit not to move to close debate. If the majority is going to move to close debate, I would rather not have the bill read by title.

Mr. WARREN. It does not make a bit of difference to us.

Mr. TABER. I would not be agreeable to that.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4425.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4425, with Mr. McCORMACK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. COCHRAN, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in opening the debate on this bill I want to inform the House and the country that while the bill bears my name, the main credit for its preparation belongs to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Immediately after the election last fall I returned to Washington to render what assistance I might be able in the preparation of another reorganization bill. I found that Mr. WARREN had already been working on the measure for 2 months. In the end we had the assistance of two outstanding members of the Legislative Reference Service and of the Parliamentarian of the House.

Further I want to say that up to the hour that the bill was introduced no official nor employee of the executive branch of the Government had ever been consulted nor will you find in the bill one paragraph that was submitted or suggested by an official or employee of the executive branch of the Government.

During the general debate on the bill Mr. WARREN will explain its provisions in detail, and while I feel that I can answer any questions that any Member desires to ask me, nevertheless, time will be conserved if those interested will await the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina.

If one attempted to trace the history of the subject of reorganizing the executive branch of the Government, he would find that Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, stated it was necessary to provide a more efficient manner for the operation of the Treasury Department.

Nearly 50 years ago Senator Francis M. Cockrell and Representative Alexander M. Dockery, both of whom happened to be residents of my own State, headed special committees appointed for the purpose of reorganizing the executive branch. Prior to the passage of the Budget and Accounting Act and the law which created the Comptroller General, older Members of the Congress will recall there was an auditor for every one of the Government departments. The law creating the auditors was the result of the efforts of the so-called Dockery reorganization committee.

For the past 50 years President after President has called attention of the Congress to the necessity of reorganizing the executive branch. Special committee after special committee has been appointed. In recent years I would say that the joint committee headed by former Senator Smoot, of Utah, made the most exhaustive study that any committee of Congress ever made in connection with this subject. It so happens that two Members of this House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] were members of the Smoot committee. No Member of Congress today realizes more than they do the necessity for this reorganization.

For over a quarter of a century I have been in contact with the departments and independent establishments. I do not feel I can be charged with being egotistical when I say I know something about them and their operation. It was for that reason that I voted to give Mr. Hoover the power to reorganize and that I voted for the bill extending power to President Roosevelt in 1933 and again in 1937. I say now that it matters not to me of what political party the President might be, as long as I am in Congress I will support legislation of this character.

I say this because it has long since been determined that the Congress itself will not pass the necessary specific legislation to bring about general reorganization.

On August 13, 1937, when we voted on the general reorganization bill, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] supported that measure. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was not recorded.

It is unnecessary for me to go into the history of what happened in the Seventy-fifth Congress, but it is sufficient for me to say that only 76 Members of the House were recorded as opposing the original House reorganization bill, while 283 Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives, supported the bill. I am confident if the Senate had considered that bill there would be no necessity today for this measure.

A moment ago I referred to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I want to quote now the opening statement of a brief speech made by Mr. MAPES on August 13, 1937:

Mr. Chairman, when I came into the Chamber this afternoon I had no definite intention of discussing this bill, but I would not be true to my own feelings if I did not say a word to compliment the committee on its work in reporting the bill that is before us.

I quote from another part of his speech:

Earlier in the session after the report of the Brownlow committee, I made a talk opposing the recommendation of that committee to put the independent establishments, including the Interstate Commerce Commission, into some department presided over by a Member of the Cabinet.

I expressed the hope then that the Reorganization Committees of the House and Senate would not follow that recommendation of the Brownlow committee and that I would be able to support the legislation this Reorganization Committee finally reported. The hope expressed at that time has come true and is realized in this bill. The bill reported by the committee is so much better than I feared it would be that I am pleased to take the floor and support it. I congratulate the committee on the bill as a whole and especially upon that part of it which expressly provides that the 12 independent commissions enumerated in the bill shall be left as they are except on the budgetary matter.

I am not going to take the time to enumerate the outstanding Republicans who voted for the reorganization bill that even gave Mr. Hoover power to abolish Government departments, nor will I mention the names of those who voted for the bill on August 13, 1937.

My good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], a member of the Reorganization Committee, characterizes this legislation as destructive. I pray his prediction will ultimately come true, because the objective is to destroy that great monster, bureaucracy, that is spread throughout the executive branch of the Government. Year by year it grows unchecked and ultimately it will destroy our form of Government if it is not itself destroyed or curtailed.

Failure of the Congress to pass this legislation or for the President to fail to abide by the mandate that it carries if it does pass simply means the continuation of the inefficiency that has prevailed not only during this administration but previous administrations and which continues to enlarge by reason of our failure to provide the proper remedy for improvement.

I cannot help but recall reading a short article written by one of our colleagues on the Republican side of the House, who some of you hope will some day be the Chief Executive of our Nation. I refer to Mr. BARTON, of New York. Mr. BARTON is a businessman, but his business, unlike many others, brings him in direct contact with the businessmen of the country and not the general public that business serves. In this article Mr. BARTON says. I quote:

There are something like 70 departments, bureaus, and commissions whose officials have the right and duty to report to the White House. No chief executive of any business tried to deal directly with more than a dozen subordinates.

Mr. BARTON should have said that there are approximately 135 rather than 70 departments, bureaus, and commissions who report to the White House.

Now let me quote another sentence.

Our country can never reach its full productive capacity if the brains and energies of its citizens are subordinated to the shifting dictates of ever-increasing bureaucracy. The bureaus and commissions should be curtailed, coordinated, and simplified as Mr. Roosevelt in 1932 promised they would be.

I do not know the attitude of Mr. BARTON toward this bill, but I do say, that as a businessman with such views as he expresses, he should certainly be urging Congress to pass this legislation, because what we seek to do in this bill is to provide that our Government will be as efficiently operated as private business is conducted.

Now I want to refer briefly to the minority report. Mr. Hoover recommended the establishment of a Division of Public Works in the Department of the Interior. What did he put in this Division of Public Works under an Assistant Secretary of the Interior? I am not going to numerate all, but outstanding was the work of the Chief of Engineers of the Army of a nonmilitary character, which includes improvements of rivers and harbors. He also transferred all of the commissions associated with the Chief of Engineers. In other words, he placed all our river and harbor work in the hands of civilian engineers. He likewise transferred to this Division of Public Works the Supervising Architect's office, which controlled the construction of public buildings.

I quote from the minority report on this bill signed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]:

There is a threat in the offing created by the powers delegated in this bill that the President will be able to create two large propaganda departments in charge of Public Works and Welfare by moving units of the Government around into two departments which the Congress itself would not stand for for 1 minute if they were put forward on their own merits.

On January 19, 1933, the House voted on a resolution which prevented this as well as the other recommendations of Mr. Hoover from taking effect. Mr. DIRKSEN was not a Member of this body at that time but Mr. TABER and Mr. GIFFORD were, and we find them voting for a motion to recommit the resolution which vote undoubtedly meant they wanted the order of President Hoover to become effective. The vote could have no other meaning.

By no stretch of imagination do I want to infer the President would do the same thing if this authority is granted, as I do not know what he might recommend, but I am pointing out that in 1933 Mr. TABER and Mr. GIFFORD were willing to create the very "large propaganda departments" they fear might result if this bill becomes a law.

In the recommendations of Mr. Hoover we find created a Division of Education, Health, and Recreation, a Division of Land Utilization in the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Hoover had the power to abolish even a department but he abolished one agency—the United States Employment Compensation Commission, by transferring part of its activities to the Civil Service Commission and that part of its duties which relate to the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act to the Department of Labor.

One more of the many recommendations I will mention. It provided for transferring to the Bureau of the Budget some of the most important activities of the General Accounting Office.

When Mr. TABER and Mr. GIFFORD voted to recommit that resolution they likewise approved these recommendations.

Now why is this bill necessary? Today we have approximately 135 departments and independent agencies and within those departments and independent agencies there are approximately 500 bureaus. The objective sought by this legislation is to group, coordinate, and consolidate executive agencies, to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort, to increase the efficiency of the operations of the Government, and to reduce expenditures to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government.

For years the businessmen of this country, individually and collectively, have demanded reorganization. They have demanded a simplification of Government procedure. That is just exactly what we seek to do through the medium of this legislation.

This bill, unlike the bill voted on in August 1937, is a bill which has as its objective solely the reduction of agencies in the executive branch and creates absolutely no new agencies. Title III of the 1937 bill created the Department of Welfare. That has been left out of the present bill. Provisions were also made in the 1937 bill that would have enabled the President to have changed the name of a Government department but that, too, is eliminated from the present bill.

A new feature of the bill is part II of the reorganization title. The charge was made that under the old bill it might be possible, if the President submitted an Executive order to the Congress, for the committee to which it was referred to refuse to take action and thus deprive the membership of the House and Senate of the power to express itself as to whether or not the proposed reorganization should go into effect. This part of the bill provides specifically that after an Executive order has been referred to a committee for 10 calendar days and the committee has taken no action, a Member can move to discharge the committee from further consideration of any resolution with respect to such reorganization plan which has been referred to the committee. Others will discuss this more fully.

Title II of the bill, providing for budgetary control, is essential, because a number of independent regulatory commissions and boards have taken the position that they do not come within the provisions of budgetary control set out in the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921. It was clearly the intent of Congress to include them within the budgetary provisions, and this title is to remove any doubt on the subject. There is absolutely no reason why all Government departments and agencies of every character should not be subject to the budgetary provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921.

Title III authorizes the appointment of six administrative assistants to the President, a separate bill creating the six assistants in 1937 passed without a roll call.

Concluding, Mr. Chairman, let me say after 6 years in the White House and a number of years previous experience in a Government department, the President expresses a willingness to make the executive branch for which he is responsible more efficient. We should accept his challenge by passing this bill and providing the way for him to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Does the gentleman take into consideration that the railroad-retirement bill should not be included in any other agency of the Government?

Mr. COCHRAN. In my opinion—and this is my personal opinion—the committee has exempted too many agencies now. Of course the Railroad Retirement Act is different from other retirement acts, but the committee gave consideration to that matter and it was not exempted.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Since the last session of Congress the Congress has created the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Does the gentleman think that that agency should be included in the exemption of the other agencies of the Government in the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. The bill shows the judgment of the committee on that subject also.

Mr. BULWINKLE. So the committee thinks it should not be included?

Mr. COCHRAN. Whatever is not exempted in the bill the committee thought should not be included within the exemptions.

Mr. BULWINKLE. And whatever is not included should be left out?

Mr. COCHRAN. That was the viewpoint of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield myself 1 minute more.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman another question which rather worries me. Last week when the appropriation for the Wage and Hour Division came up the gentleman instead of reorganizing the Government disorganized a department.

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not agree with the gentleman that I did. I explained my position very fully as the gentleman would know if he had listened to me at the time. I made the statement on three different occasions. I stated very clearly that in no manner, shape, or form was I casting any reflections upon the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am not talking about reflections on anyone. I am talking about taking from the Department of Labor and creating another agency.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thought the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division would be in a better position to properly administer his funds if in charge of the funds.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then you were creating another agency after all?

Mr. COCHRAN. Oh, no; not by any means.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. COCHRAN. It was already created.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, when we come to consider this bill, I am hoping that the membership of the House will go very carefully into the situation that is presented, with the idea of thoroughly understanding what is before them. Anyone who would say that the Government of the United States did not need to be trimmed up and put in shape, its superfluous activities cut out, would be indeed unappreciative of the situation with which we are confronted.

I was unable to grasp from the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. COCHRAN] whether or not he was delivering a eulogy upon Mr. Hoover and basing his argument for support of the bill upon the fact that Mr. Hoover did himself propose some schemes for reorganization. I was unable to tell whether or not the gentleman wanted the Congress to know whether or not this bill was the same kind of a bill that was put up to the House and passed by it when Mr. Hoover was President of the United States. Really I think the membership should know. Let me say to you in the first instance, and square-toed, that it is not. That bill contained a provision requiring only negative action of one House of Congress to defeat a proposed reorganization. This bill becomes effective unless there is a concurrent resolution passed by both Houses of Congress disapproving it, and if a measure submitted has an item that one House positively and affirmatively and by a decided majority of its Members disapproved of, but the other House refused to act upon, that proposed reorganization takes effect.

Section 407 of the old bill of 1932 provided as follows:

Provided further, That if either branch of the Congress within such 60 days shall pass a resolution disapproving of such Executive order or any part thereof, such Executive order shall become null and void to the extent of such disapproval.

Now, there is another difference between that bill and this one. Here only a total disapproval is permitted. There a disapproval in part was permitted. In other words, if either House of Congress should disapprove of any part of the proposal on the part of the President, that went out and the other part went into effect. I think that as we consider this resolution we should have some of those things in mind.

What is the legislative picture at the present time with reference to proposed reorganization? I hold in my hand a copy of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921. Section 209 of that act reads:

The Bureau, when directed by the President, shall make a detailed study of the departments and establishments for the purpose of enabling the President to determine what changes, with a view of securing greater economy and efficiency in the conduct of the public service, should be made in (1) the existing organization, activities and methods of business of such departments or establishments; (2) the appropriations therefor; (3) the assignments of particular activities to particular services; or (4) the regrouping of services.

The results of such study shall be embodied in a report or reports to the President, who may transmit to Congress such report or reports or any part thereof, with his recommendations on the matters covered thereby.

Now, let me give you the picture of another side of reorganization, along the lines referred to in that very section 209. Last summer just before we adjourned, Mr. Bell, Director of the Budget, came before the Appropriations Committee, and he was granted an increase in his staff for the deliberate purpose of investigating the activities of the Government—the bureaus and establishments of the Government. He was given a set-up something three times in number and amount of the establishment that he had already for the direct purpose of carrying into effect section 209. Mr. Bell told the Subcommittee on the Treasury when he was before the committee this winter asking for his appropriation that in his opinion, if his proposed set-up was allowed, there would be no occasion for any reorganization bill, because by trimming down and by such regrouping of activities as was within the scope and range of the Executive, we would be able to accomplish those things that promoted efficiency in the departments and in the bureaus and establishments of the Government without any reorganization act at all.

Now, that is the current situation.

The Brookings Institution came out with a book on the reorganization of the National Government today. It was written by Lewis Meriam and Lawrence F. Schmeckebier. The book states that reorganization is the proper function of the Congress.

What has been the history of the last 6 years? Has any proposal of reorganization been submitted to us under section 209 of the Budget and Accounting Act? There has not. Were any accomplishments made by the President when he had this absolute power in 1933 which promoted the saving of funds to the Treasury of the United States? There were not.

Did the Committee of Reorganization, the commission that was appointed by the President, composed of Louis Brownlow, Charles Merriam, and Luther Gulick, propose to the Reorganization Committee at the hearing that they held any definite proposal of reorganization? They did not. They were asked specifically by my colleague upon the committee, Mr. GIFFORD, if they could not give us a sample of what ought to be done, and they gave us nothing.

I have given you a little bit of the picture. I want now to give you a picture along some other lines. It has become customary lately for the Government to be run on the basis of delegation of authority. For 6 years now we have appropriated enormous sums of money, close to $20,000,000,000, for alleged relief. Most of this money has been turned over to the President to allocate around as he had a mind to. What has been the result? Has it promoted efficiency and economy, or has it promoted extravagance and disaster? It has resulted in the allocation of enormous funds for regular departmental activities of the Government that were not needed. It has resulted in riotous waste and extravagance. It has resulted in a denial to the Congress of the appropriating power that is absolutely necessary if the Congress is to be able to maintain for the American people their liberties. On top of that we have delegated enormous powers under the N. R. A., under the A. A. A., every one of which has been disastrous, every one of which has resulted in contributing more than anything else to the sorry state in which America finds herself today. [Applause.] Now, this is something of the picture of the delegation of authority. Let me say to you that I for one do not believe that this Congress should delegate any further authority to the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Let me say to you that I believe the entire authority that is set up in section 4 of this bill already exists in section 209 of the Budget and Accounting Act with the exception of just a few words that are not intelligible, and those I will call specific attention to a little later.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does this bill confer upon the President the power to abolish any function created by a legislative act?

Mr. TABER. It does. In my opinion if the President had any constructive ideas with reference to Government organization he would have submitted them to the Congress for its legislative approval. The very fact that he has no constructive ideas, no ideas with reference to the reorganization of the Government which would result in efficiency and economy is proved by his failure to submit them to the Congress with the request for legislation.

I am not ready yet to say to the people of the United States that we here in Congress are afraid, are unable to function; that we are unable to pass legislation which would cure any ills from which this Government is suffering; but I can see in the offing—and we referred to it in the report—the creation of two great big departments designed not for efficiency but for waste. The gentleman from Missouri suggested that Mr. Hoover proposed the department of public works, but let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Hoover's proposal for a department of public works was made at a time when the public activities along that line were not over 10 percent of the activity that is now going on; it was not such a serious thing at that time because the activities were small. Activities have now been extended until they are on a scale which is a menace to the solvency of the American Government.

Let me say to you that we are facing a deficit in this current fiscal year of $4,000,000,000. Let me say to you that unless something is done to trim off the appropriations that are being brought in here, unless something is done to trim off these extra governmental activities which are swamping the American people and preventing their employment, and preventing recovery—let me say to you that this country is going to be in the throes of a Democratic depression just so long as this kind of operation lasts. [Applause.]

The object of the creation of these departments of public works, and public welfare is so that those bureaucrats can by a concentration of propaganda maintain their activities at top speed right straight through. They realize that they are right on the line and that unless something is given to them to put the pressure and the power on, unless their power of propaganda is concentrated, that they are gone and that these bureaucrats are going to be curbed by the Congress. Should we place in the hands of the Executive at the time that that effort is being made by these bureaucrats to hang on—place power in their hands to twist us around and make us subject to their will? I ask you: Are you ready to surrender the birthright of the American people to these bureaucrats who would destroy us unless curbed and unless we put the brakes on spending by this Government?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I desire at this moment to call attention to a few specific provisions of the bill.

On page 3 of the bill, section 3, line 8, appear the words "except the function of preparing estimates of appropriations."

Frankly, I cannot understand that that has any meaning in that particular place in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that is the only line the gentleman wrote in the bill—he himself.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman is mistaken, I have not written a line.

Mr. WARREN. No; that is a fact.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WARREN. We will be delighted to take it out, because we cannot understand it ourselves, and the gentleman is the one who wrote it.

Mr. TABER. I did not. Well, that will settle one question.

Then over on page 5, section 4, with the exception of some minor amendments which I shall suggest, is not so bad, but section 5 is an absolute delegation of power to the President to handle this reorganization set-up. If the President were to submit a proposal along the line of section 209 of the Budget and Accounting Act, or along the lines of section 4, with some amendments that might be offered, and affirmative action were required of the Congress before a reorganization proposal became effective, it would not be such a bad situation. Section 5, however, requires that we take a positive negative action to stop it. It should be amended so that affirmative action is required of Congress making a reorganization.

I think I might call attention to the majority report, if you have it before you.

The provisions of the bill clearly define what the President can and cannot do, and definitely set out the power of the Congress to prevent action that he might take from going into effect.

There is not anything anywhere in the report indicating that it requires the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress. It is said that the action of one House alone, the reservation to one House by concurrent resolution, to stop a thing is not constitutional; but a provision requiring a concurrent affirmative resolution of both Houses is constitutional; therefore, that is what we should have. There should be no legislation going through here by indirection that could not go through directly. That is the crux of the whole situation.

We must so amend section 5 that the resolution required in order to have a reorganization plan take effect shall be a positive and affirmative action rather than a negative action. This means no bill can then go through unless it is approved by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Can more than one motion within the 60-day period be made to discharge the committee?

Mr. TABER. I understand not.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Do I understand this bill takes an entirely different course from ordinary legislation, in that the House might disapprove and if the Senate approved it would still become law?

Mr. TABER. That is just the situation in which this bill results.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention for a moment to title II. In my opinion that is a good section, except I do not believe the Budget should have the power to control the apportionment of the funds of any regulatory commission so that they would have the right to reserve 10 or 15 percent out of the appropriation of one of these commissions. There is an exception in section 3 exempting certain regulatory commissions, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Congress makes an appropriation of $10,000,000 a year to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That Commission must apportion this money so that it lasts through the year. That is so provided by the law. The Budget Director must approve of that under the antideficiency law which was passed away back in 1906.

That is perfectly proper, but the Budget Director has been accustomed to reserving 10 percent or 15 percent in some cases out of the appropriations of all departments. I do not think the regulatory commissions should be subjected to the power on behalf of the Budget to reserve a portion of their appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, I feel I should call attention to these things as I go along. I shall call attention to more as the bill is read for amendment and I shall ask for the support of the House of the amendments I will offer in order to try to make this a bill that the House of Representatives should pass.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I have been reading section 3 of this bill. I understand that the purpose of the section is to exempt from the provisions of reorganization the agencies named therein, among which is the Board of Engineers of the War Department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and others. Does the gentleman understand that to be the purpose of the bill and that it actually does exempt those agencies from its provisions?

Mr. TABER. That is my understanding; yes.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. In regard to the language under subsection 3, which the gentleman said was not clear to him, and which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] accused him of writing, does the gentleman mean he does not understand what that language does except in reference to the function of preparing estimates of appropriations?

Mr. TABER. I do not understand what it does.

Mr. MOTT. I do not have any difficulty in understanding that. These agencies under subsection 3 are exempted from the provisions of this act, except as to their function in preparing estimates of appropriation. If the words mean what they literally imply, it means that a reorganization plan may take away from any of the agencies named the function of preparing estimates of appropriation?

Mr. TABER. It might be the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask another question? If I am correct in that statement, what would be the effect of such a provision?

Mr. TABER. Well, if the President said they should not prepare their estimates in accordance with the Budget Act, there would not be any prepared by them. They would come to the Congress, that is all.

Mr. MOTT. What would be the result of that?

Mr. TABER. It would be up to the Congress to start in de novo to build up an estimate, I suppose, in the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. MOTT. That would take a large part of the jurisdiction and functions away from the Committee on Appropriations, would it not?

Mr. TABER. No; it would not take any jurisdiction away from that committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I find the answer to my second question on page 10.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. ROBERTSON. There is language to the effect that if a motion is agreed to or disagreed to, such motion may not be renewed. Would not the practical effect be that a reorganization plan would come to the Congress? It would be referred to a committee. After 10 days someone may move to discharge the committee. We would have a vote after 10 minutes' debate. If the said motion to discharge is defeated, that would end the matter for the session.

Mr. TABER. It would end the matter for that proposed scheme of reorganization if the Congress were in session for 60 days from the date the proposal was submitted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does not the gentleman believe that in connection with a comprehensive reorganization we ought to have more than 20 minutes to debate it?

Mr. TABER. I think we should.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to direct my question to line 15, page 2 of the bill, with reference to the declaration of the Congress that the purposes specified in subsection (a) may be accomplished in great measure.

Mr. TABER. I do not believe that Congress should make that declaration, and I expect to move to strike out that provision when that point in the bill is reached.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I also say that on referring to the December 31 statement of the Civil Service Commission with regard to the number of employees I find that 98 percent of the total number of employees, or 792,886, are under 20 agencies while there are only 31,299 employees under the 38 remaining agencies. The total force account, as the Commission terms it, is 93,118.

Analyzing these 20 agencies which have 98 percent of the total number of employees and applying that against this bill, I see no power on earth whereby the President can effectuate the provisions of subsection 1 of subsection (a) of section 1 of the bill.

Going one step further and taking the 1940 Budget of $8,995,000,000, and bringing that down and applying it against the bill, I do not see any possible way the President under this bill can effect any economies of any consequence unless he eliminates entire departments of government.

Mr. TABER. The bill is not designed to effect economies.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I am wondering what the effect might be if a minority of the Members of the other body should resort to a filibuster which continued past the period of 60 days the debate on one of these proposals.

Mr. TABER. As we reach part 2 of title I, I shall call attention to the fact that I do not believe that constitutes any security to the House. As to procedure, I do not believe they can depend up the rules of the houses when they are set up in that way, because the Constitution has reserved to each house absolute control over its method of procedure.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Under this measure, you are giving the President authority and power to submit a plan of reorganization, or, rather, put one into effect, except as Congress might object to it?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Did this committee give consideration to the idea of letting a committee of Congress provide a plan of reorganization and submit it to the Congress? Is it not a fact that, after all, the President himself will have to look to certain advisers for the purpose of submitting of a plan? What I am asking is whether or not the committee gave consideration to submitting a plan of its own.

Mr. TABER. The committee had no hearings whatever on the subject of reorganization except the formal preliminary statement of Messrs. Brownlow, Gulick, and Merriam. The hearings on the subject did not amount to anything. This bill is brought out absolutely without hearings and without any consideration such as a measure of its importance should have.

Mr. REES of Kansas. This bill was just submitted to a committee for consideration as is, is that it?

Mr. TABER. As is, and not even considered at all. We were there for a little while.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. Under the bill is it contemplated that the reorganization proposed by the President must be embodied in one plan, or will it be possible for the President to submit recommendations in piecemeal?

Mr. TABER. The language is somewhat vague in section 4, but my construction of the language would be that the President might submit one plan or he might submit a half a dozen separate plans. I think this should be cleared up somewhat. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I would prefer before yielding for interruptions to get down to an explanation of the bill itself, and at the conclusion of the explanation I shall be pleased to yield to any Member of the House.

Mr. Chairman, we would like to have considered this matter on a nonpartisan basis. The offer for such consideration was made and was rejected by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. It remains now to be seen what is going to develop here along that line. The supreme, crucial test will come on one amendment which the gentleman from New York has stated he intends to offer.

I quote the Republican platform of 1932:

Efficiency and economy demand reorganization of Government bureaus. The problem is nonpartisan and must be treated so if it is to be solved. As a result of years of study and personal contact with eliminating activities and wasteful duplication of effort, the President is particularly fitted to direct measures to correct the situation. We favor legislation by the Congress which will give him the required power.

In discussing this subject it is necessary to give you as briefly as possible the historical background. Every President beginning with Theodore Roosevelt, and I wish I had time to read you what he said on the subject, has advocated reorganization of the Government. The question has been approached from many angles, all without results. Under Mr. Coolidge a joint committee of the two Houses was set up, lasting through three successive Congresses. On that committee, as I pointed out about a month ago, was the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Mr. MAPES, and also on that committee, although serving at that time in the Senate, was the distinguished and able Senator from New York who now graces this body, Mr. WADSWORTH. The able Senator HARRISON, of Mississippi, was likewise a member of that committee.

That was a working committee. They submitted their report. They did not stop there, they submitted bills to carry out that report. The House of Representatives at that time was overwhelmingly Republican, the Senate of the United States at that time was overwhelmingly Republican, but because of bureaucracy and its power, and because of the fact that that committee did not have any privileged status, they were not even able to bring to the floor of either House the splendid recommendations they had made and which at that time would have given efficiency in the administration of this Government.

We now know from long and bitter experience that Congress does not want to do it. We know that Congress is not going to do it, and, furthermore, we know that Congress cannot do it.

Then came Mr. Hoover's administration. He recommended legislation for reorganization. He said to give him the power and he would do the job. At that time the House of Representatives had a Democratic majority of four and the Senate of the United States had a small Republican majority. What did we do? Was there any response made to the appeal of President Hoover? Yes, a Democratic House, with the present Vice President of the United States as its Speaker, and with the Democrats in charge of the committees of the House, brought out that bill and gave Mr. Hoover powers such as no President in peacetime had ever before been given by any Congress so far as I can find. Why, we gave him the power to destroy absolutely and wipe off the books with a stroke of the pen such commissions as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission and things of that character. We gave him the power to destroy absolutely, in fact, not only bureaus and boards and commissions, but the very executive departments themselves by stripping them of all of their functions.

Well, there was a provision in that act that such reorganization as might be sent down here by Mr. Hoover could be stopped by a resolution of either House of Congress. He sent down his plans, as the gentleman from Massachusetts will tell you. He sent them down after the people of the United States had spoken by almost unanimous vote and had driven him from office. He sent down those plans and they came before a committee of the House and were considered, and it is true a resolution went through with Republican support, if you please, stopping those reorganizations, but not before the Director of the Budget, Colonel Roop, appointed by Mr. Hoover himself, had appeared before the committee and said, "Those plans will not work and if you take my advice you will reject them." On top of that, we find the Republican Attorney General under Mr. Hoover telling him that the act we passed was invalid because a resolution of either House was not sufficient.

Now, when I speak of this authority given to former President Hoover, I call your attention to the fact that we not only gave it to him, but we wrote all of this vast delegation of power contained in that bill as permanent law of the land. It was not limited to 2 years or 4 years. We placed it on the books to last all the time, not only for him but for all other Presidents.

Well, what happened then? Just before he went out of office, and according to the recommendation of his Attorney General and in conformity with the decision of his Attorney General, the Congress of the United States, and the House, by unanimous vote, amended the Hoover act and struck out the provision that one House only could stop one of these orders, because we knew and believed it to be unconstitutional after reading that opinion, and we did one more thing. We said, "No, we do not want this to remain on the books as permanent legislation. Although Mr. Roosevelt is going in for 4 years with an expectancy of 8 years, we do not want this legislation to be made permanent," and we amended it to extend the power to President Roosevelt for 2 years only.

Let us now see how nearly correct is my friend from New York. You heard him a few minutes ago say that Mr. Roosevelt had this power from 1933 to 1935 and that he never exercised it or did anything under it. This just shows you how little my friend knows about this subject or has investigated it. Under the power given to the present President he acted 27 times. He sent down here 27 Executive orders, several of the orders dealing with various subjects of governmental activities.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WARREN. I will yield now.

Mr. TABER. What I said was that the President had never exercised it to effect any efficiency or economy.

Mr. WARREN. Well, let us see if he has. The most noteworthy thing that he did under that power was to set up the Farm Credit Administration. Was there any kick about that? Did anybody at that time desire any veto upon setting up that agency?

What else did he do? He went among these departments, and he reached here and he found a purchasing agent and he reached here and found another and here another, and he came over here and found some agency letting contracts, and over here another agency letting contracts, and he merged them and abolished and consolidated, and he abolished functions and set up the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department. Let it be said now throughout the length and breadth of this land that no bidder who goes before the Procurement Division has ever come away and said he did not have a square deal. That was not true before that agency was set up.

What else did he do? We had one agency handling immigration and another handling naturalization, and he combined those two. Then he set up an order involving the national parks and abolished functions, because without that abolition there is no chance whatever for any economy.

Mr. Chairman, when this thing is all over we will look back in amazement at how we quibbled and created ghosts and made much ado about nothing when we were trying to bring about some economy and efficiency in government. There is nothing fundamental about this proposition.

Mr. Roosevelt's power expired. If he did not go any further than those 27 orders that he issued during that period, no legitimate criticism could be raised against him. We know what was happening then. We know at times and just prior to them that the very foundations of some things were tottering. We know how both the Congress and the President were engrossed in other matters. That authority expired, and the next attempt was a bill passed by the House on August 13, 1937. That bill did not provide for any possible review by Congress. The order became effective, absolute, at the end of 60 days. That bill also contained a provision for a new Department of Public Welfare. It passed this House by a vote of 283 to 75—a nonpartisan vote, if you please, and the entire argument on it was from a nonpartisan attitude. That bill went to the Senate. The Senate rejected that and brought in a bill loaded down to the very gills, which finally passed that body by 5 votes. It then came to this House. Although we had passed two of the four parts of the program, we were confronted with the fact that we had to strike out the Senate bill and offer again to the House the four programs of the House, two of which we had already passed. I am not going into that fight. We know the mass propaganda, we know the misrepresentation, we know everything that happened here over a period of about 15 days, and the bill was finally defeated here by 8 votes.

Why is reorganization necessary? Someone else can tell you why more eloquently than I can. I quote from Senator BYRD, of Virginia:

The fact is that we are paying for a gigantic, gangling Government of some 150 major agencies and an uncounted number of subdivisions. We are paying for a Government that has not had a thorough overhauling since it was established. It has been growing continually, but since the turn of the century the record shows marked increases in costs and complexity. Piled upon a previous accumulation of disjointed agencies we now have half again as many agencies as we had before the depressions, when, to meet emergencies, we created by statute and Executive orders agency after agency, virtually without regard to coordination in the Federal Government pattern.

Some of these agencies fill very definite needs. Others overlap. Some have outlived their usefulness or have been superseded. There are glaring cases of duplicated effort. Where the Government was complex before, it frequently is found to be confusing now. To point out 50 Federal agency legal divisions in Washington alone is enough to describe the Federal jungle.

There have been at least 29 agencies concerned with lending Government funds according to reports taken from Government records.

There have been at least three agencies concerned with insuring deposits and loans.

There have been at least 34 agencies concerned with the acquisition of land.

There have been at least 16 agencies concerned with wildlife preservation.

There have been at least 10 agencies concerned with Government construction.

There have been at least nine agencies concerned with credit and finance.

There have been at least a dozen agencies concerned with home and community planning.

There have been at least 10 agencies concerned with materials of construction.

There are more than twoscore personnel officers for the Government listed in Washington offices alone.

There are more than 100 information and publications offices in Federal agencies at Washington.

There are more than 100 Federal agency libraries in Washington besides the Library of Congress.

The Federal Government operates an average of one motor vehicle for every 1,200 people in the United States, and they travel enough miles every year to traverse nearly every highway in the world.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WARREN. I prefer not to right there. I shall later. Add to those mentioned by Senator BYRD, and we have 28 agencies of this Government handling welfare matters; we have 14 agencies handling forestry matters; we have 4 agencies dealing with the examination of banks.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. And we have over 65 agencies gathering statistics. I yield.

Mr. TABER. How many of those have been created by delegation of authority to the present President of the United States?

Mr. WARREN. Admitted that we have created them, a great many of them, and it is admitted that the gentleman's party did when it was in power.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is Senator BYRD in favor of this reorganization plan?

Mr. WARREN. I have had no conversation with Senator BYRD, and that is beside the mark. There you have just a few examples, Mr. Chairman, of the veritable hodge-podge that now exists.

We have produced and brought into being a vast bureaucracy, at times of our own accord and at others under the urge of various executives, that has now become a Frankenstein which has become greater than Congress itself, its creator, and which arrogantly and contemptuously flaunts itself and snaps its fingers into our very faces. [Applause.]

There are today over 190 principal bureaus and divisions in the 10 executive departments of the Government. There are 58 independent establishments, boards, authorities, commissions, and so forth, exclusive of at least a dozen interdepartmental committees and various Government corporations, at least 10 in number, making approximately a grand total of 270.

Believing that the American people desire to see something done about this question, this bill now under consideration is a sincere effort along that line. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has told you, it was drawn here. It was drawn as a common meeting ground, with a frank recognition that the omnibus bill defeated last year contained some provisions that met with sincere and legitimate objections from many able members who otherwise would liked to have been for it. This is now the bill of August 13, 1937, with two major exceptions; that is, the bill that passed with a vote of 283 to 75. The Department of Welfare, although advocated by President Harding, President Coolidge, and President Roosevelt, is out. The other exception is where in the other bill the order plan went into absolute effect at the end of 60 days, we now provide for direct action to stop a plan by concurrent resolution, if it does not meet with the approval of Congress.

Had a former leadership on the minority side given us minority representation on the select committee of men who had not already voted and who had not steered their very hearts and souls and minds against any legislation on this subject, then we would have had no difficulty about any of this.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WARREN. In just a moment. I have not come to my friend yet. [Laughter.]

If we had had on this committee the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Mr. MAPES, who perhaps knows more about this subject than any man in Congress today, if we had had the brilliant and able gentleman from New York, Mr. COLE, or the gentleman from New York, Mr. ANDREWS, or the handsome Republican whip, Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT, of California, or the distinguished gentleman from Kansas, Mr. HOPE, or the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CRAWFORD, an able student of government, or dozens of others, where we could have received cooperation, I still say there never would have been any trouble about this whole thing.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. There were only two of us against nine of you. Whether we were so harmful or so useless, what difference does it make? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. We have never yet heard a constructive suggestion come from either one of you. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober—from the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], drunk with bias and prejudice, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] in his more rational moments.

[Laughter.] On August 13, 1937, in discussing time for the consideration of that bill—I quote him as follows:

I think an hour and a half will be sufficient on this side. I do not want to ask any more time than we need. I think that that would be a fair amount.

During that same debate he said:

Title I—

That is what this bill is—with those two major exceptions, is very largely the same as the bill that was passed in 1932 when Mr. Hoover was President. It is very largely the same as that that was reenacted on March 20, 1933.

Again in that debate the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] said this:

The result of the passage of this bill would be to give to the President the power to do these things. Whether or not you ought to give it to him I shall discuss in a moment. Frankly, with the exception of these few agencies, and perhaps with one or two exceptions that have not been made but perhaps should be made, I believe it would be better to permit the President to abolish agencies, to move them around insofar as he wants to, because it would not be giving him any more control over those agencies than he has now.

Again in that same debate the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] said this:

I have no idea whether the President will abolish any of them. I think at least half of them should be abolished. I do not think there is any question but what the efficiency of the Government would be greater if we had fewer agencies.

And now listen to this. He wanted the Department of Welfare stricken from the bill, and that is the only reason he did not vote for the bill. This is what he said:

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of title I of this bill. I believe that is the only way that you can get rid of some of these agencies. I hope something will be done, but I do not know.

Take a Department of Welfare out of the bill, and I will support it, said Mr. TABER. Well, we have taken it out of this bill, and he has gone back on everything he ever said on August 13, 1937.

Some day after his allotted span, after he becomes weary of earthly existence, my friend the gentleman from New York is going to become a candidate for heaven. I am in favor of it and I vote for him now; but here is what is going to happen: As soon as he enters the pearly gates he is going to protest the plan of salvation itself and will offer an amendment to change it, and they are going to throw him out. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care at this point to yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Some of us in the space of 2 years have come to realize thoroughly the objects of the administration and to feel that we must have a congressional check upon things that we give him or they are going to be abused. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Now, you take our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. Off the floor he is one of the most delightful gentlemen I have ever met. I really love him. Living at the same hotel, I delight to talk with him nights, and I profit by his wisdom and his Cape Cod philosophy; but when it comes to this legislation he is like a disappointed old woman, he becomes a carping and garrulous critic. He would vote against a bill containing the Ten Commandments if it were offered from the Democratic side of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Oh, what a wonderful chance these gentlemen could have on this occasion to walk down the aisle arm in arm and come up and accept the right hand of fellowship, to make public profession of faith, to confess their sins, and vote for something that will inure to the benefit of the American people and to the Congress itself. [Applause.] No; they will not come. Not one constructive suggestion have they made throughout all of this legislation. The one and only thing that the gentleman from New York has offered was a provision about estimates in the preparation of appropriations. Believe me in spite of his denial, he wrote every word of that sentence. He put it in the former bills; we continued it in this one. And I said this morning about 9 o'clock when going over this bill that it is the only language in the bill that I do not understand, and now we find he has run out on that. [Laughter.] We are going to take it out.

Mr. Chairman, let us analyze the bill. In the first place this bill has been endorsed by that great Republican bible in the State of Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia Inquirer. It opposed the bill before. It has been endorsed by Gen. Hugh Johnson. He opposed the bill before.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WARREN. In just a minute.

I have here splendid editorial comment from the Minneapolis Journal, the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Baltimore Sun, the Minneapolis Star, the Kansas City Times, the Springfield Republican, and the Christian Science Monitor. Now let us see what the bill is.

The standards of this bill are set up on page 2. They are the same standards we gave Mr. Hoover. They are the same standards passed by this House 283 to 75. The only thing we have done is to improve merely the wording of them.

On page 2, (b) is new; yes. That is a declaration of policy; and we intend by amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] further to strengthen it.

Section 3 deals with exemptions. It also provides that the President shall not have the power either to set up a new department, change the name of an existing department, or to create a bureau or other agency and call its head the secretary. Now, those agencies are exempted, but we have made an improvement over the former bill. The President cannot touch any of those exemptions in any way, shape, or form, but he can add to them. If he is going to abolish or transfer some bureau or some of the functions of some bureau I think everybody will agree that he ought to have the right to add to them.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. In 1 minute.

As I just stated, we are going to strike out Mr. TABER's language dealing with the function of preparing estimates for appropriations.

I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My question is not directed from the standpoint of one who will oppose the legislation, because I will support it, as I did in the last session of the Seventy-fifth Congress, and I feel I lost hundreds, perhaps thousands of votes in the election due to my action, but I believe such reorganization to be needed badly. I am wondering, however, when the gentleman speaks about exemptions, what the reason is in his mind why the United States Forest Service is not included.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, indeed, there is. Personally, I think there are too many exemptions in this bill. In view of section 5, which would give Congress the veto power it could be very strongly argued that there ought not to be any exemptions.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think that might be true if in a resolution of disapproval the Congress had the right to specify certain actions. It seems to me, however, with the resolution of disapproval being a blanket resolution, that is the weakest point in the whole set-up.

Mr. WARREN. I will get to that a little later.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. WARREN. I was about to answer the gentleman's question. Most of the agencies exempted here are the so-called quasi-legislative agencies. I do not approve of all those exemptions, and we have added three more to them since last year, but they have been added because we were trying to get a common meeting ground to put this necessary legislation over.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a very short question.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Where did the force come from to secure the exemption of such a minor agency as the United States Employees' Compensation Commission?

Mr. WARREN. I will tell the gentleman. I doubt very much if that should be in the list of exemptions. This committee is not going to bother civil service, and we have written an exemption covering the civil service. Because the Employees' Compensation Commission is more or less correlated with the civil service, we decided to put that Commission in.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I notice on page 3 there is no reference to what is known as the National Resources Committee. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not he or his committee gave any thought to that subject?

Mr. WARREN. I will gladly tell the gentleman my own personal views on that subject. That matter has been before three committees of the House, as I recall—the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD]; the Committee on the Public Lands, and the Committee on Reorganization. I do not absolutely close my mind and say that I would never support any given proposition, but I have never yet seen a draft of a bill, I may say to the gentleman from Texas, setting up a proposed national resources board that I would support, and I would take the floor and oppose it with all the energy at my command because when you begin talking about setting up a supergovernment that would do it.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. At the last session of the Congress I opposed the reorganization bill, with a great deal of reluctance, on two grounds—the setting up of the welfare department, which I regarded as dangerous, and the fact that there was no assurance there would be economy result from reorganization. I am happy to say today that section 1 of the bill, the very first one, emphasizes that very thing:

To reduce expenditures to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government.

I am happy to say to the gentleman from North Carolina I think I am able to enthusiastically support this bill at the present time.

Mr. WARREN. I am very delighted to hear that, and I assure the gentleman that economy is one of the things we are trying to get at by this bill.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for another observation?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. The principal reason upon which I opposed the bill last year was on the ground I felt that the bureaucracy itself was the most dangerous enemy of democracy that there is in existence; that the creation of a welfare department with an expenditure of probably four or five billion dollars might make it very dangerous in this country.

Mr. WARREN. This bill is a fight on bureaucracy.

Mr. MAY. I am glad to join it.

Mr. WARREN. Section 5 is the heart of the bill, taken in connection with part 2 containing the rule.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has already served notice that he intends to offer an amendment requiring affirmative action by both Houses of Congress before this plan can go into effect. Let us not have any misunderstanding about this. You cannot be for the bill and at the same time be in favor of that amendment. If you are for that amendment you are certainly against the bill. All of that will be argued when the bill is read for amendment.

In the first place, the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from New York would, if adopted, make the bill itself unconstitutional, because the President already has the right under the Constitution to transmit to the Congress anything he pleases for our consideration. Putting this right in the bill would be attempting to put an unwarranted curb on the powers already guaranteed the President by the Constitution of the United States. That will be the motion to recommit.

We will then see whether it is the Republican leadership that stuck its head in the sand in 1932 and let the whirlwind pass over the American people that is going to be followed or whether the new, revitalized Republican leadership that has come in here this time is going to assert itself.

Mr. KUNKEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KUNKEL. I would like to know how the gentleman figures that particular change would curb the power of the President? Why would it not leave it exactly the same as it is?

Mr. WARREN. In effect it would. Of course, if the amendment is adopted, then you would have no bill, because the President has a right to do that now.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On page 4 of the bill, subsection (c) reads as follows:

The abolition of the whole or any part of any executive agency or the functions thereof.

Does the gentleman from North Carolina agree with his committee colleague, the gentleman from New York, that that confers upon the President the right to abolish a function created by an act of Congress?

Mr. WARREN. If unnecessary, yes. That is the only way you are going to get economy, and that is what the gentleman from Virginia has been advocating. There are bureaus in this Government today that ought to be abolished. There are bureaus for which there is no earthly excuse for their existence.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I agree with the gentleman. On page 10 we find the usual House rule on a motion to discharge.

Mr. WARREN. I am going to get to that, if the gentleman will wait.

Mr. COLE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. In line with what the gentleman has said in regard to section 4, paragraph (c), if it is true that the President would have the power to dismiss the function of any department, what, then, is the meaning of section 3, paragraph (a)?

Mr. WARREN. Because we are excepting those. We say he cannot touch the functions of any of those agencies.

Mr. COLE of New York. Section 3, paragraph (a), states:

No reorganization plan under section 4 shall provide (a) for the abolition or transfer of any executive department or all the functions thereof.

Mr. WARREN. That means he cannot take any 1 of the 10 executive Departments and abolish them.

Mr. COLE of New York. In section 4 it is said that—

Whenever the President, after investigation, finds that (c) the abolition of the whole or any part of any executive agency or the functions thereof is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes—

He makes the recommendation.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman fails to distinguish between "department" and "agency."

Mr. COLE of New York. All right; section 2 defines an executive agency as any executive department. I wondered if there is any explanation of the distinction between the two.

Mr. WARREN. No; I assure the gentleman the President cannot abolish an executive department, nor can he change the name of it, nor can he merge it with any other. I will look into that if there is any question whatever about it.

Mr. COLE of New York. Being the author of the bill and entirely familiar with the effective purposes of it, can the gentleman answer this question: Is it intended by this bill that the President's reorganization recommendations shall be embodied in one plan or may the reorganization be done piecemeal?

Mr. WARREN. No; the President could send 1 or a dozen or 50 plans. Of course, no one has any idea how many he would send. He used the power 27 times in the 2 years he had it. I have no reason to say this, but personally I believe it would be in about 5 or 6 plans.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BEAM. Apropos of what the gentleman says, is not section 3 (a) relative to an explanation of section 4 (a)?

Mr. WARREN. I think so. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BEAM. While the gentleman is on that matter, I would like him to explain the language on page 4, line 18, subsection (3), where it states:

Make provision for the transfer of such unexpended balances of appropriations available for use in connection with the function or agency transferred or consolidated.

Will the gentleman explain to the House just what is the significance of that paragraph relative to appropriations?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. That does not mean, of course, that the President could appropriate $1 of money. The bill states "unexpended balances." Suppose he should abolish this agency or consolidate this agency with that. Then he would have the right to take the money already appropriated by Congress from the agency abolished, if he saw fit to, and put it over into the agency that had been retained.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the President should make separate recommendations, the 60-day provision would apply to each separate recommendation?

Mr. WARREN. To each separate one of them.

Mr. McCORMACK. One of the distinguished Members on the other side asked of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] what would happen if the House passed a resolution and the Senate failed to pass it. This situation applies to any legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Why, of course.

Mr. RISK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Not right now. I wish to progress with my statement.

Now we come to the rule, part 2. Within a few minutes after this bill was introduced on February 23 the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] rushed to the press and it was heralded in the papers that afternoon and the next day and he was quoted as saying it was unconstitutional, it was terrible, that whoever wrote it was crazy.

Well, I did not write it. I would not have trusted myself with any such careful drafting as that. The "crazy" man, the man the gentleman termed "crazy," who wrote every word of it, was none other than the able, brilliant, and beloved Lew Deschler, the great Parliamentarian of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

We have had Asher Hinds, of Maine, who came here under Speaker Reed and who later was a distinguished Member of this body. We have had the late beloved Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, with whom many of us served. We have had the distinguished Senator from Missouri, BENNETT CLARK, as Parliamentarian for his father. We have had the very able CLARENCE CANNON of Missouri, author of a monumental work, Cannon's Precedents and Cannon's Procedure of the House of Representatives; and we have had Lehr Fess, from Ohio. I say that Lew Deschler is the peer of any of them and is not surpassed by a single one of them as one of the greatest of all parliamentarians. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The gentleman might also state that Mr. Lewis Deschler was first placed here by a Republican Speaker, one of the ablest men we have ever had.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to say he was brought here by the late Speaker Longworth, and to the eternal credit of Speakers Garner, Rainey, Byrns, and Bankhead they have refused to make a political issue out of that great office and have kept him here; and I hope he will always be here. [Applause.]

Why do we have the rule? This was drawn solely for the opponents of any particular plan of organization. I went to Mr. Deschler and told him that I wished that rule to be like fences we used to build down there in North Carolina, that I wanted it horse-high, bull-strong, and pig-tight. I invite and challenge criticism of it. It will do the work, and it will make a filibuster in either body absolutely impossible. As it is drawn, 10 days after the arrival of one of these plans of organization that he might not like, any Member of either House opposing the plan can rise and say, "Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution to prevent that plan from going into effect." If a majority votes to discharge the committee, then there are 10 hours of debate, and if a majority of the House then desires to stop the reorganization there is nothing in the rules of the House that can prevent it. It then goes on to the Senate, and the same procedure is followed.

The rules outlined in part 2 of title I of the bill provide a method whereby Congress can express its opinion of the reorganization plans formulated by the President. These rules will prevent a militant and determined minority from obstructing an expression of opinion by a majority. They apply to both Houses of the Congress. Through the operation of these rules a successful filibuster in either House against a concurrent resolution disapproving of a reorganization plan would be impossible. The purpose of parliamentary law—and the rules set up in the bill are merely a statement of that—is to permit in an orderly manner an expression of opinion by a majority while at the same time protecting the rights of a minority. A representative form of government must, in order to continue to function, be implemented by the forms of parliamentary law. Rules of procedure, which we ordinarily call parliamentary law, while permitting adequate debate on any proposition, should provide a certain and sure method of ascertaining the will of the majority on any question. The rules provided in the bill will permit a majority of either House, after adequate debate, to have its will manifested in a vote on the reorganization plans submitted by the President. These rules, while providing a special order of procedure for the consideration of a concurrent resolution disapproving a reorganization plan, in no other way interfere with the ordinary procedure of the House or Senate. It might be pointed out that, with the exception of the limitation put on debate, the remaining language in part 2 of title I of the bill merely gives a privileged status to the consideration of a concurrent resolution disapproving a reorganization plan.

Without repeating the technical language incorporated in part 2 of title I of the bill the provisions contained therein permits any Member who disapproves of any reorganization plan formulated by the President to introduce a concurrent resolution disapproving of such plan. The Speaker or Vice President, as the case may be, must refer it to a committee of the House or Senate. If such committee fails within 10 calendar days to report such resolution, then a motion to discharge such committee from the further consideration of the resolution becomes a privileged motion and any Member who is in favor of such resolution may call it up for consideration. If a majority of the committee to which the resolution has been referred favor its adoption by the House they may report it to the House and a motion to consider such resolution is given a privileged status. When taken up for consideration in the House debate on any such concurrent resolution is specifically limited to not to exceed 10 hours, although it would be in order for any Member to move to limit debate to a lesser time. The rules specifically preclude the offering of any dilatory motion. There is also a provision in the rules which permits the substitution of a concurrent resolution of the other House if such House has acted more expeditiously than the other. It is anticipated that a majority of both Houses, despite the most vigorous opposition of a minority, could adopt a resolution disapproving a reorganization plan within 40 days, thus permitting a leeway of 20 days to take care of any unexpected emergency that might arise after the reorganization plan has been submitted by the President.

Ah, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] says it is unconstitutional. Well, let us see about that. Just because he says it, does not make it so.

Article I, section 5, of the Constitution stated that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

A law passed by an existing Congress, with the concurrence of the House, has been recognized by that House as of binding force in matters of procedure. In exercising its constitutional power to change its rules, the House may confine itself within certain limitations.

The gentleman says you cannot do this by a concurrent resolution. Check up this, if you will. Every 4 years we pass a concurrent resolution—and the gentleman from New York always votes for it—providing for the counting of the electoral vote, which takes place here in the House of Representatives, but we go further than that. We provide in that resolution for procedure for the House and Senate in the event the electoral vote of any State might be challenged. The gentleman from New York says, of course, that is unconstitutional.

With respect to title II of the bill, under the decision in the Humphrey case, we had something new to appear down here in respect of some of these agencies. They shrugged their shoulders and said, "We are not under any budgetary control," quoting that case. The Court, speaking of agencies such as the Federal Trade Commission, said that they were legislative agents, but did not say they were part of the legislative branch. Now, all that title II does is to bring every single, solitary one of them under Budget control, and I believe everybody in this House favors that.

Title III provides help for the President, not this President but all Presidents. It is not up to us to question or quibble about what the Executive needs in the way of help.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I recognize that the 20-minute limitation is the usual limitation, but we are dealing here with an unusual situation, and if a motion to discharge be voted down that is all the debate there will be on a reorganization plan, although it touches every function of the executive branch of the Government. Would the gentleman mind having 2 hours of debate evenly divided and not just 10 minutes on the side?

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I would object. The gentleman from Virginia wants two bites at the cherry. Of course, if you cannot muster a majority, then it goes into effect, but if you can muster a majority, just as when you vote on any other discharge motion that comes up here, you may have 10 hours of debate.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman misunderstands me. I said instead of having 10 minutes' debate on the side, what would be the objection to giving at least 1 hour on the side as it would be the last opportunity we would have?

Mr. WARREN. We have followed verbatim the existing rules of the House dealing with motions to discharge.

I want to say just one more thing. Somebody is going to get up here and charge that when this bill goes to the other body they are going to attempt to load it down and will load it down with things that have already been defeated in the past by the House of Representatives. There is not a word of truth in this. I am authorized to stand here today and say, in behalf of Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, that if the House passes this bill, it will be considered solely on its merits in the Senate and there will be no disposition to add any extraneous matter to it. If there is any extraneous matter added to it, I am authorized to say by our committee that it will not become a law with such matter added to it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman—

There is amongst mankind
So much that is pretense,
That you cannot judge the state of mind,
By outward evidence.

I think the gentleman who preceded me, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has a real liking for me. He has so declared although criticizing some of my activities in this Chamber. The "carping criticism," as he terms it, does not disturb me because I presume it may be carping criticism. I mean it to be. But that I would be antidemocrat on every bill, even if the Ten Commandments were included, is certainly not so. However, if it were a Roosevelt bill, with the Ten Commandments included therein, I might be inclined to start with a certain prejudice. I am sometimes democratic; I have voted with you many, many times in the past, but I have lived a fearful existence during these latter years under your present leadership. So have you. Shocking, nothing but shocking is it when a bill of this kind can be railroaded through here like this, with no hearings, no chance for you new Members, who were not here last year, to be permitted to know what it is all about. Shocking that this committee had so little confidence in the President, that they decided he must not know its contents, and that they must get the bill in here and get it out of the way before he should be informed about it. And get it tied up with all kinds of promises, even from Members of another body, so that his wishes will not be considered even if he desires any material changes. And no amount of pretense can cover up the present situation.

Shall I also take time to eulogize the Parliamentarian of the House? I think I might likewise grow oratorical in my praise of him, if this were the time for it. If by addressing that praise only to make a comparison in order to discredit one of the hardest-worked Members of this House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from North Carolina fails in his purpose. I do not think the Parliamentarian would want that extraordinary praise at another's expense.

I have always tried not to be too personal in my references, except as to party measures, or the real leader of the party in control of such measures. I respect my colleagues in this chamber. I desire their respect more than anything else in the world, even though I am a "carping" speaker.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. In a moment. Recall that committee, sitting in secret for a year or more with the Brownlow report containing such startling proposals that we were pledged to silence. Only 4 of us out of 18, we in the minority, had to carry the fight against that large majority. It is always left for the minority to present suggestions and point out dangers in proposed legislation. That is their duty. Such action is the highest form of statesmanship. If you care to call it carping criticism, well and good. I could entertain you for a long time regarding the proceedings in that committee. Personally I am a little surprised that the gentleman who preceded me should even think to characterize the two members of the minority as so useless and so lacking in understanding.

Mr. KITCHENS. I think probably the word "carping" was used to charge the gentleman with being critical. In other words, as I understood the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] who preceded the gentleman from Massachusetts, he simply wanted to impress on us that before he offered the gentleman a hard-boiled egg and the gentleman said he wanted a soft-boiled egg, and now when he is cooperating he offers the gentleman a soft-boiled egg, and the gentleman now wants a hard-boiled one or none at all, and he probably misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no. This smells a little sweeter than the last bill. But we must have a new leader in the White House before we grant any additional powers. We are astonished at the statement that the President had acted so many times under the authority granted him in 1933. That 26 orders were promulgated which brought about great economy in Government is indeed amazing to us at this time. We knew he had greatly changed. If he could reorganize in that manner why force him to do so much at one time, by bringing in a full and complete reorganization of the Government? Why do we not continue that orderly procedure that would be approved by both parties?

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PATRICK. Is the gentleman a Republican in his politics?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes. But I hold Democratic views sometimes, Brother PATRICK, and rather think I agree with you a good deal of the time, if you would but admit it.

Mr. PATRICK. How does the gentleman feel this afternoon?

Mr. GIFFORD. I probably feel a great deal as the gentleman does, if he but spoke his mind.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALTER. If the method employed under this resolution is so shocking, why was it the gentleman did not object when a similar resolution was passed on the Consent Calendar giving to the Supreme Court authority to revise all rules of practice and procedure in the courts of the United States?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, that past history is so far back that I do not recall it.

Mr. WALTER. At the last session of Congress.

Mr. GIFFORD. Please do not bring up all the mistakes and errors that I have made, if they were errors. That, however, was undoubtedly a good bill.

Mr. WALTER. I distinctly remember the gentleman was pilot at that time, and he had an opportunity to object, and his objection would have prevented the adoption of that resolution.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to make it plain that sometimes I may have made errors. He asked her, "Haven't I seen you before?" "Yes. Sometimes I go to questionable places." [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MASON. Perhaps the explanation was this, that a great majority of the Congress had perfect faith in the one branch of the Government that was given that power to reorganize the courts, and there might be lingering some doubt in the minds of some of us as to whether it is advisable to give another one of the three great coordinate branches this same power.

Mr. GIFFORD. Exactly.

Mr. PATRICK. What I really rose to ask the gentleman was this—I know it was my error in jumping about, but will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. With pleasure.

Mr. PATRICK. Would the gentleman oppose any reorganization bill that could be brought in as long as the present President is in the White House, under the statement the gentleman made a moment ago?

Mr. GIFFORD. I should, if it were only a gesture to express my disapproval of his spendthrift policies.

Mr. PATRICK. If it were only a gesture?

Mr. GIFFORD. That would be sufficient justification for me. I think that is a confession I ought to make. I do not trust this President to be granted any more powers such as those included in a reorganization bill that would allow him to wreak even more havoc in the financial condition of our Government.

Democrats eulogized Hoover today. The word "Hoover" does not lie in your mouths to use for your own purposes. The powers granted him remind me:

Oh, mother, may I go out to swim?

Yes, my darling daughter,

Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
But don't go near the water.

That is the power you granted to Mr. Hoover. When he attempted to swim, you kicked him out of water, unceremoniously. Do not bring that argument up again. It is not to be employed as a parallel, even for debate. We can only congratulate you Democrats for the trust you apparently had in Mr. Hoover at the time you originally granted those powers. You recognized him as a safe and sane administrator.

Mr. PATRICK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PATRICK. Then, if the gentleman trusted the Chief Executive now, would he favor this bill as now drawn?

Mr. GIFFORD. The suggestion comes too late. "The great spendthrift" will be his title. Because of that, how can I trust him to act under a reorganization bill, freezing into it all his pet corporate devices and making them permanent, as we know he would do.

Mr. PATRICK. That does not quite answer the question.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know that I should answer it. A question relating to trusting the President is so difficult. He is the only President I now have. May I be allowed to use another illustration? I could not go any further afield than the last speaker, could I? I did not hear him talk much about the bill. But, you know, actions speak so much louder than words. We might say that the President's intentions are debatable. I will share this conversation with you. I think it is worth repeating. It was supposed that the President had taken a great hold upon the common people. Those expenditures were presumed to have been made for the relief of a distressed people. I heard this on one occasion in the last election contest. It was being debated as to how much the President loved the ordinary people. Behind the stove in a grocery store one old gentleman spoke up and said, "Them Roosevelts certainly love the common people." Another old gentleman spoke up and said, "Nuttice they didn't marry none of 'em." [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I assure the gentleman from Massachusetts I do not want to speak out of turn. I simply rose to make the observation that I disagree personally with the gentleman upon the proposed legislation. However, I feel this House fails in its obligation when one member of a group charges another member of a group with insincerity, regardless of which side of the aisle it comes from or whatever question is being considered. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. I was really placed in an embarrassing position. But I read the other day that husbands should be willing to tell their wives everything and the wives should be generous enough to believe it. [Laughter.] So if I really told you my inner feelings when I said I did not trust the President, I hope you will be generous in your view of it. I am sure you will not greatly misinterpret it.

Now, the oratory indulged in by the gentleman who preceded me forced me into the position I have just taken in these few remarks. Will you indulge me now for a few minutes that I may read into the Record a statement that may have some semblance of real argument.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. The gentleman is making a very fine talk and has made two or three fine confessions today. Will the gentleman confess that Mr. Hoover is a Republican baby that you fellows do not want on that side of the aisle?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; I have always had a deep appreciation of Mr. Hoover. I do not know that I understand the gentleman's attempt to embarrass me. I wish he could be more explicit. Many of these questions seem rather vague.

He asked, "Will you marry me?" She said, "I am cogitating on the advisability of allying myself with somebody of doubtful pecuniary circumstances." He said, "I don't get you." She said, "Well, that's what I'm trying to tell you." [Laughter.]

I trust these pleasantries will not do any harm and will not detract from the dignity, I hope, of the following statement I will read:

It will appeal to many that this is not an opportune time to bring forward any sort of reorganization bill. It may afford further opportunity for possible dramatic gestures of further control and change in the present structure of our Government. It is not to be expected that the fear that seized the minds of the general public because of extraordinary demands relating to the forcible seizure of the Supreme Court, and the supreme control of even the independent agencies set up by the Congress, has greatly lessened. Unwillingness to recommend the abolishment or discontinuance of any of the multifarious so-called emergency devices and the constant recurring demands for continuance of reckless spending make it exceedingly doubtful that any power of reorganization would be used with the slightest viewpoint of a greater economy in expenditures.

At this critical period recovery is uppermost in our minds. With the lip service, at least, of those high in administrative circles, we have felt encouraged. However, appointments are being made to key positions affecting business that have shocked the people. Great numbers of the hitherto patient and willing supporters of the President in the Halls of the Congress itself are amazed. Many observers are commenting on the petulance exhibited at the White House. It seems that this condition is clearly recognized by the majority of this committee in their evident haste to present this apparently inoffensive measure. It seems not to have been presented to the Executive or to some Corcoran adviser for approval or suggestion. It is, indeed, interesting in that it seems an expression of opinion on their part that if the people were informed that it was a measure asked for by the Executive, it would have, perhaps, small chance of passing the legislative branches. We rejoice that the rubber-stamp era seems to have passed. Patronage being practically exhausted and the President himself on the way out, we may expect more courageous action. A GLASS, BYRD, or HARRISON may now receive some real assistance from those who have heretofore been somewhat hesitant to follow their real convictions. The evident truth of the present situation is that this measure is hastily presented merely to forestall a more rabid demand that might be made in view of the Presidential decree that "reorganization" is a part of the "must" program of this session of Congress. We think we sense the viewpoint of the majority of this committee and to that extent it is highly pleasing.

However, it is the duty of the minority party which is not bound by the ties of party loyalty to the great spender to restrain and, if possible, prevent any further startling innovation or any attempt to freeze emergency devices under the regular departments. We are entirely fed up on the creation of devices set up to avoid supervisory control by the Congress and allowed to operate at pleasure under Government guaranty of their debts. We were once promised that admission of failure would be readily made. The road back should have been taken long ago. We recall the President's boastful remarks when prosperity seemed to be somewhat returning and the particular never-to-be-forgotten joyful outburst "We planned it that way." Not even in that auspicious moment was there shown any suggestion for any great retrenchment in Government expenditure or the doing away with any of the crazy-proven experiments.

The example of the determination to continue our silver policy in the face of proven asinine or donkey results is now before us. The naked absurdity of this has been held up to our gaze in the many addresses in both branches of the Congress. Yet this administration seems determined not to yield in the slightest, even toward a modification of it.

We read courageous words from Democratic Members of great prominence, even to the assurance that they will refuse to extend the debt limit to the $50,000,000,000 requested. The Budget message has informed us that the debt must necessarily reach the forty-four billion mark next year. It is wholly inconceivable that the cost of the present structure of government could be reduced from $10,000,000,000 yearly, to a point comparable to income. This declaration of outright refusal is so amazing that it is unbelievable that these true patriots can hold to that position. However, the Executive would probably find ways of taking care of the debt other than using social security funds for the purpose. Billions of gold now lie in the hills of Kentucky. The magic wand granted in his emergency powers would enable him, undoubtedly, to carry on and dissipate whatever valuable assets might remain.

Much will be made of the argument that powers similar to those contained in this bill were granted to Mr. Hoover. This claim is easily disposed of. A simple resolution by either branch was sufficient to refuse his recommendations. This was done in summary fashion. Mr. Hoover had not frightened the Nation with demands for extraordinary powers. His recommendations to the Congress in 1932 were most carefully considered and contained no startling suggestions.

You gave him the power with a safe string to it, and it was a string which you pulled summarily. He presented to you in 1932 a carefully detailed, well-thought-out recommendation, and yet you gave it no consideration.

Refer not again to Hoover, you Democrats. You use him for your own ends, merely. It is simply pretense.

Contrast those carefully considered detailed proposals with the amazing general demands of the President's Brownlow committee. These demands were so astounding that for months meetings of the committee were held in the greatest of secrecy. When a bill was finally presented to the House, violent criticism was expressed over the entire country. The actual provisions of the bill were lost sight of in view of that high-handed grasp for power over matters entrusted by the people to the legislative branch of the Government.

The debate in the House exposed its great political significance. The majority leader and the Speaker hurled themselves into the debate and were accorded the last opportunity afforded for argument. It was highly spectacular. They told their followers that if the bill was defeated, it would destroy the President. The burden of their arguments to their majority of more than 5 to 1 was "The Republicans will get you, if you don't watch out." No speaker in opposition was allowed one moment to reply to those speeches.

It was a question with them of destroying their President. They urged the Members to destroy themselves. Your leaders had little regard for your own safety. They were so loyal to the Executive that it mattered not what happened to you. I wish I could draw that picture for you as it should be drawn. Was Mr. Farley on the telephone that day? Was Mr. West spending almost the entire afternoon in the dining room downstairs? During those last few days were allocations for all sorts of things going into congressional districts?

It was reported here on the floor, without any refutation, that all the schemes and pressure possible were being brought to bear on these Democrats on this side who were wavering. The leader of the discussion on that day against the bill, the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'Connor, seems to have been destroyed. Verily, he got his reward for assuming a truly patriotic position.

I have here but I will not take time to read them some of the remarks of your leader [Mr. RAYBURN] and of the Speaker himself while pleading "not to destroy your President." The bill did not pass. Was your President destroyed? They said he would be. I await an answer. Was he destroyed?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I shall be glad to have an answer.

Mr. HOOK. The Gallup poll shows that he was not, and that the people have faith in him yet.

Mr. GIFFORD. Good! There is one faithful new dealer left.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Gladly.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Apropos the gentleman's thought that the time for debate does not give opportunity for adequate information, I think the gentleman agrees that that would make very little difference to his colleagues on the Republican side of the House. Permit me to make an observation and call attention to a statement that was released to the press by one of my Republican colleagues from Pennsylvania last week to the effect that he voted wrong on a certain bill because he got mixed up as to what the orders were from the minority leader.

Mr. GIFFORD. Strange. I cannot speak for all on this side of the House. I have not the slightest information how the minority will vote. I should think that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], after the bouquets that have been thrown at him and those very laudatory expressions, would have to vote with you. One or two other Republicans were mentioned in flattering terms by Mr. WARREN. It may be very persuasive.

There is nothing like flattery of that sort. I replied once to one who told me that he wished to flatter me: "Flattery, soft soap. Soft soap 90 percent lye." [Laughter and applause.]

The other day when we were debating Guam you took particular pains to mention the names of two Republicans, Hurley and one other, giving their favorable views relating thereto, as if that should alter our views. It failed in its purpose, coming from you. Regarding this bill, I have to take the position I do because I do not wish to embark on such a voyage with the captain now in command. The scars of the battle of last year still remain, and we have learned what to expect.

Senator BYRNES was quoted a few moments ago as having said that if this bill goes to the Senate it would have very careful consideration. That was not a very definite assurance. We recall what happened a year ago to the measures sent by us to that body. We may well fear a repetition.

The bill passed the House and was sent to the Senate. As the previous speaker stated, it came back loaded to the gills. However, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] and other leaders fought hard to carry out the ideas in the Senate bill as to doing away with the Comptroller General's office and changing the character of the Civil Service Commission.

The previous speaker stated that those controversial items have been taken from this present bill in an effort to get harmonious action, but he also said that more exemptions had been made than he thought should have been included. If the Senate puts these items back, what attitude can he then take, in view of that statement?

Mr. Chairman, this committee extended to the gentleman from New York, Mr. TABER, Mr. Dickson, and to me the courtesy of inviting us into the meeting the other day when the bill was considered. We happened to be named to that committee as minority members. We spent 2½ hours and several suggestions were made as to amendments. Suddenly one of the members of the committee moved that the bill be immediately reported. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] moves fast, determinedly, and quickly, whenever called upon, as we have often witnessed. We have seen him perform in the chair and on the floor, and what a marvel of abruptness and efficiency he always is.

The committee promptly voted to report this bill. There was quite a bit of hesitation about granting proper time to file a minority report. That explains fully the brevity and lack of sufficient analysis in the report before you. The public must not know anything about this lest they send you telegrams and letters. Because of the battle last year they recognize the dangers inherent in any such proposal.

What will the people think of such a proceeding? But it is "must" legislation and a bill of some sort must be presented. It is merely a less dangerous proposition and hence should be challenged.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I have in mind how meanly Democrats often spoke of my great President, Calvin Coolidge. They used to call him "Cal" over on that side of the floor. The previous speaker said we had a Frankenstein in Government. May I say in good nature that instead of its being a Frankenstein it is a "Franklinstein." I may say also that this is not original with me, but I adopt the expression.

I have a memorandum of several things which I desired to bring to your attention but my time has expired. In the remarks made in last year's debate on this bill you will find that someone claimed that the depression was caused by the fear engendered by that reorganization bill. The public had been greatly frightened as a result of the extraordinary demands for power made by your President. During the last 3 or 4 weeks the business index has been going down and down. Is this bill adding to public confidence?

Economy in Government. Under this President? Do not carry that joke too far with me. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to appear presumptuous, but I do want to offer a few suggestions as coming from a new Member of this body.

The bill now under consideration came to my attention as a Member of the House on February 23, 1939, notice of its introduction having been given to the House by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] at that time. The notation on the bill indicates that on March 3 it was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed. As a Member of this House I saw the bill this morning for the first time as I came on the floor of the House. This is the first opportunity I have had to know what is in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it was reported then, but the bill was introduced and was available on February 24.

Mr. KEEFE. It may have been available and it may have been printed, but I saw it for the first time this morning. Mr. WARREN. That does not make any difference.

Mr. KEEFE. And I think most every other Member of the House is in the same situation.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LORD. On Saturday I tried to get a copy of this bill from the document room, and I was informed it was not available.

Mr. KEEFE. May I say further that in the campaign last November one of the very important issues before the people of the country, rightly or wrongly, was the fight on the reorganization bill in the last Congress. The fight was so bitter that it prompted the President of the United States to go into a number of States and attempt to purge Senators and Congressmen who dared vote against the reorganization plan offered during the last Congress.

Repercussions of that fight were heard in the State of Wisconsin, and it was one of the major issues in the campaign. Those who had favored reorganization were overwhelmingly defeated by the people who thought at least they knew and understood the plan that had been offered during the last Congress.

Now a new bill is offered. As a Member of Congress, I have tried to intelligently read this bill. I am frank to state that from a reading of the bill it would seem that the Special Committee on Reorganization has tried to remove many of the objectionable features found in a previous measure. I want to call the attention of the newly elected Members on the Republican side, however, to the fact that the people back home who sent you and me to Congress—and one of the main issues in the last campaign was the reorganization bill—have not as yet had an opportunity to know and understand the difference between the proposed reorganization bill now under consideration and the term "reorganization" as used in the last Congress.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the people of the United States, who, after all, are the ones interested in this matter, should have an opportunity to know and understand the provisions of this bill before we, as their Representatives, are called upon to vote on the measure. It seems to me that this bill was not referred to a committee. If it was referred to a committee, it was a select committee, and reported out after about 2½ hours of discussion. There were no hearings of any consequence held. There has been no publicity in the newspapers in the section I come from that you could call publicity, which would advise the people of this Nation what the difference is between this bill and the bill so bitterly fought during the last Congress.

I believe they are entitled to know, and if there is a difference, they are entitled to know what that difference is. We cannot get that publicity to them in a couple of days of debate on the floor of the House.

Now let me speak of just one or two other things in reference to this bill. I have asked some of the older Members of this House—and I confess my ignorance and incompetence and my lack of experience—why is it necessary to have a reorganization bill at all? Why must we have a reorganization bill? The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], who spoke this afternoon, stated here in the Well of this House:

We have boards, we have commissions, we have bureaus that ought to be abolished.

I asked the gentleman:

Then why does not this Congress abolish them?

[Applause.]

If this Government needs reorganization, why do not the Members of this Congress, which by delegation of its authority through these boards and commissions gave this great power to the bureaucracy in America, stand on their feet and perform their function and their duty and reorganize this Government and abolish these bureaus and commissions? [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Just one moment.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. KEEFE. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

I will tell you the answer I got from distinguished Members of this House. They said, Oh, Congressman, you are new. You do not understand the situation. These bureaus and these commissions are so powerful that if we attempt on the floor of the House to reorganize this Government and abolish any of the useless bureaus and commissions they will be down here with their minions and their employees and their experts and they will buttonhole the Members of Congress and they will threaten them and browbeat them to the extent that the Congress will not dare to act. I want to say as one Member of Congress, at least, that I am ashamed of that confession of incompetence on the part of this great Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

It seems to me that if the Congress of the United States is willing to concede and admit that it is incapable of protecting the interests of the people as against the whims of the bureaus and bureaucrats in this Government, we had better fold our tents and go home and let them run the whole Government. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman may say he is incompetent and does not have information, but no Member of this body from the dean down could have explained better than has the gentleman why this bill is necessary.

Mr. KEEFE. May I just make this further observation to the gentleman from Missouri? This bill states it has certain purposes. I do not have time to read them, but the fundamental purposes of this bill are to prevent duplications in Government service, to wipe out extravagance, to promote efficiency in operation, and to promote economy. In the 2 years the power to reorganize the Government was rested and vested in the hands of the present President he issued 27 Executive orders, it has been stated. Where is the economy? Where has there been any reduction in the number of boards or commissions? It is said that we now have 117,000 Government employees here in the city of Washington and hundreds of thousands of them scattered throughout the country. All you are asking in this bill, as I see it, is that we turn over to the President the power to make a reorganization as he sees fit within the limitations prescribed in this bill, and then when he has indicated his plan of organization he tosses it into the lap of Congress. Then, unless the Congress by a negative vote negatives the action of the President within 60 days, it becomes law and becomes operative.

I want to say to the Congress and to the people of this Nation that I think it is high time the Congress began to take back unto itself its powers and duties and responsibilities. We should have a Congress of men able to stand on their own feet and defy bureaucracy in this country and abolish these bureaus, boards, and commissions ourselves. If the President of the United States has in mind a program, let him bring that program here. If it will tend to accomplish the purposes of this bill, I, as one Republican, will vote for it; but I will not vote for this bill, which seeks to put in his hands the power to make this reorganization without first bringing the proposition to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is rather unfortunate for me that I follow the very able and vigorous gentleman from Wisconsin, but, on the other hand, I believe it was fortunate for me that I heard him. He is the only speaker I have heard today, being in a Subcommittee on Appropriations writing up a bill. I was not able to hear the preceding speeches.

I am opposed to any reorganization bill in this Seventy-sixth Congress for six reasons:

First. This is not a recovery measure. We are still in the throes of trying to recover, and everything should be concentrated toward the end of saving this country. There is no saving in this reorganization bill in any large degree or particular.

My second reason is that economy is not emphasized. Economy ought to be equal with efficiency in every reorganization bill, yet economy was not mentioned in the bill a year ago except in the preamble, and it is not emphasized in this bill. Remember what experts of the Brookings Institution stated this morning—they are a sort of efficiency committee these days and we frequently refer to them—that nothing material can be gained by regrouping—that something has to be cut off. There will not be anything in particular cut off under the present reorganization bill.

My third point is that this bill, in spite of what may have been said to the contrary, is tarred with the same stick as was the bill of a year ago. We know what the bill of a year ago tried to do to the General Accounting Office. We know what it tried to do with the Civil Service Commission, and the civil service has had enough done to it already. We know what that bill proposed in its first paragraph. It was going to create a new department of government, particularly for the man who has recently been advanced to head another department. This was the essence of the entire bill of a year ago. It started out by creating a new department. This measure is the same old bill, revamped and sugar-coated a little bit so we will swallow it, and it is the same old bill tarred with the stick of a year ago.

Fourth, this is primarily the President's bill, and it is his urgency and impetus that is bringing it before the House at this time in an endeavor to rush it through to passage. The President is a wonderful man in a lot of ways, but he is very bullheaded, and he never gives up trying to get through anything he starts, even if he has a fight on it. [Applause.]

The fifth point: This is the only unsuccessful "must" legislation that has not been passed in some form. Now, you may say the Court measure was not passed. The Court bill was not passed, but the President now has his fourth opportunity to fill vacancies on that Court, and he is sort of getting even on his bill to revamp the Court and take over the Judiciary by reason of the vacancies that have already occurred, and he has 2 more years to go. He got his second N. R. A. in the wage and hour bill, although the original N. R. A. bill had been thrown out by the Supreme Court by a 9-to-0 decision. He got his A. A. A. bill again in the farm regimentation bill of a year ago. He has had every important "must" measure but this one.

This is the only one that is left, and he has just got to have it, although there is no recovery and there is no economy in it. It is the same old bill, and I do not know that there is a single man over on this side of the House out of the 159 or 160 who did not promise that he was not going to vote any more powers to the President; and there were a lot of you over on the other side who silently and secretly at least told the leaders and others on your side that you would not vote to give any more powers to the President if you were sent back. Is not that so, Mr. Cox? Well, you do not have to answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. If the gentleman wishes to catechize me I shall be glad to accommodate him, but I dare say the gentleman would rather use his time for some other purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Now I come to the last one. If there were any one point of the six that I would like to emphasize it is this last one, and I may say that I have had no quarrel with the President of the United States. He has not treated me unkindly in any way. I voted for a lot of the New Deal measures in the Seventy-third Congress. They were emergency measures when we were trying to save the country, and I voted for them before we turned to making them permanent. I think he is a wonderful human being, a delightful human being and has done good in some ways; but of all the places where I would not want to put him it would be, after having created a 50-percent addition to the bureaucracy of the country, putting the same man to the work of reorganizing this bureaucracy; because, naturally, he would favor those things which he has created in these new set-ups, and they showed in the old bill their animosity to some of the old set-ups, like the General Accounting Office, the Civil Service Commission, and some other establishments of that sort.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. GEYER of California. I know the gentleman has said he would not vote for the bill regardless of what the bill may be, but the gentleman has made so many statements here that he has led me to believe he has not read the bill. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Yes; I have.

Mr. GEYER of California. Then I suggest the gentleman read it again.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Oh, well, that is old stuff. The gentleman has not told me anything new. I have been hearing about this reorganization matter for several years and I know what was in the bill a year ago and I knew that they sugar-coated that a little bit and gave Congress a little power to veto, but they have still given the President a lot of power, and the one reason why we should not pass any reorganization bill in this session is because the man in the White House is not the man to reorganize the Government. It is springtime, baseball is here, and what this country needs, if we are going to have any reorganization, is a pitcher and not a quarterback; and we must have somebody that will be for economy as well as for efficiency and we should have a man who has not himself created this great bureaucracy. Even if you could pass this reorganization bill it would not amount to anything. There would not be any saving and you would only be thwarting any effort in the succeeding Congress with a President who would make such a reorganization real. Let us postpone this entire matter until that time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McCORMACK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4425) to provide for reorganizing the agencies of the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOOR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask the gentleman when he contemplates the vote will be taken on the final passage of the reorganization bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. Of course that is a matter that is up to the House. We have used not quite half the time for general debate and have about 5½ hours left.

Mr. MAPES. Is it fair to assume that the vote will not be reached tomorrow?

Mr. COCHRAN. I could not say what the temper of the House will be tomorrow. Personally my opinion is that the House will not be able to reach a vote tomorrow.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I think most of us agree with that opinion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have a discussion here upon the subject of a reorganization plan, and I ask unanimous consent to have it extended in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE REORGANIZATION BILL

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, today and for the greater part of this week a most important piece of legislation will be considered by the Members of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and it is the reorganization bill. Very few, except committee members, have had an opportunity to familiarize themselves with this measure, yet we are expected to pass our opinion upon its constitutionality and soundness in a limited number of hours.

It is my conviction that extraordinary appropriations and all legislation should first be scrutinized as to its constitutional aspects. The chairman or members of the committee should be prepared to inform the House about the real purpose of this legislation. I, therefore, ask the chairman:

- (a) Who proposed the reorganization bill?
- (b) Name those who drafted the bill.
- (c) Will it reduce Federal employment?
- (d) Will it reduce Federal expenditure?
- (e) Do you believe it is necessary and if you do, why?
- (f) Did any member of the committee or of the Seventy-sixth Congress aid in the drafting of the reorganization bill?
- (g) Do you believe the Constitution of the United States delegates powers to Congress to enact and pass the reorganization bill?
- (h) If the chairman believes the reorganization bill is constitutional, please state where in the Constitution delegation of such power may be found.
- (i) Will the chairman of the committee please state where in the Constitution powers are delegated to Congress responsible for the enactment of the legislation which has provided and set up private corporations under Federal control?
- (j) Will the chairman also state clearly and precisely what powers of control Congress has over such private corporations which are now operated and owned by the Federal Government?

I herewith hand you these questions and ask that you reply to them on the floor of this House. My purpose in asking for information is to determine if Congress has had anything to do with this bill. It is my opinion that Congress is acting in a rubber-stamp capacity in passing legislation with which it may not be in sympathy, for the simple reason that someone desires to have it enacted. The people are entitled to know who is behind such legislation and the committee should enlighten the Members of the House in this respect.

I shall now ask the majority leader and the chairmen of the following committees, the Judiciary, Appropriations, Rules, and Ways and Means, to reply to these questions:

Shall Congress confine its legislation strictly within the Constitution of the United States? Shall we honor our oath of obligation, "To preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution" as it is and as it was given to us, or shall we dishonor our oath of affirmation by supporting unconstitutional legislation and so betray our people and destroy a republican form of government? My colleagues will answer that question when they vote on the reorganization bill. The life of the Republic hangs in the balance.

It is my opinion, therefore, that a bill which involves fundamental changes in the Government—such as this one—should first be considered from its constitutional angle by each and every Member of the House, and we should have sufficient time to study it thoroughly. If the bill is found to be unconstitutional or even questionable, it should be voted down without fear or favor.

I challenge the soundness of procedure and rules which govern the formulation and presentation of legislation. Appropriation bills, as well as legislation, are considered in a committee. Such proposed legislation is then brought on the floor of the House and recommended for passage, but the time set aside for consideration and debate is often only a few hours. Many Members are in complete ignorance of the measure to be considered and must for that reason accept the committee's opinion as to the soundness of it. At this stage reason no longer prevails; it becomes instead a party duty to follow the leader; and at this point Congress has ceased to function as a deliberating body.

President Washington warned us of this when he said:

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which, nevertheless, ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischief of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

The legal phraseology of legislation and its paragraphical references are not only confusing but are in reality introduced for the purpose of obscuring the real intent of the legislation proposed. It is worded so that it is an appeal for public approval, but the real intent in the many instances is to destroy public liberties. Much legislation has little or no intelligent meaning to many Members of the House, for it is not based upon common sense and sound reasoning. It is, instead, a legal concoction not understood by the Members of Congress or by the committee itself.

I realize that some of you may question this statement, but if such thought enters your mind I cannot refrain from reminding you that all unsound and unconstitutional legislation now in force was sponsored by the majority of the committee in charge of it. That should be sufficient evidence even to the committee itself that it did not understand the legislation it proposed. If the committee did understand such measures as, for instance, the Gold Reserve Act and the stabilization fund, it put its O. K. on unconstitutional legislation. In either case, it is a beggar's choice.

Being a new man in Congress, it may appear to my colleagues that I am presumptuous in addressing the House as I am doing today. Yet I want you to know that I am concerned with only one thing, and that is the general welfare of the United States and our people. We are now confronted with the reorganization bill, and it is clearly an unconstitutional piece of legislation.

Congress should understand that new legislation is not required to reorganize the Government. On the contrary, if the Government is now found to be disorganized or in a chaotic state, it is because Congress has failed in its duty. Congress has been remiss in its responsibility by allowing legislation to be enacted which is now threatening national security. Inasmuch as Congress is responsible for the muddle we are in, it should be courageous enough to get us out of it.

The Constitution delegates the power and makes it obligatory upon Congress to always maintain sound, constitutional government and at the same time guarantee a "republican form of government to the States." It follows, therefore, that Congress alone has the power to reorganize the Government, and it is obligatory for it to do so. If reorganization is necessary—and it is—Congress should appoint a committee to carry out such reorganization under the direct supervision of Congress. In other words, it is a serious matter and one in which each and all of the Members are interested and for which Congress alone will be held responsible.

If there are Members of Congress who do not feel capable of conducting such reorganization, they should not stay here and vote for unsound legislation but should instead resign and go home. Members of Congress should understand that the Constitution delegates no power to them for shifting their responsibility to others, so when Congress enacts legislation which deprives it of its own powers, popular government hangs in the balance. Those who support and vote for such measure as the reorganization bill betray public trust and should not be returned to Congress.

I think it is high time that the people of the United States should know what Congress is doing and has done to them. While here I shall make it my business to pass information to those most concerned, and they are the people who have created our prosperity and made our country great and strong.

Now please understand, gentlemen, that there is not a Member in this House who wants to reorganize the Federal Government more than myself. It is not only my viewpoint but it is my greatest desire for the Members of this body to take hold in a real businesslike fashion and reorganize this Government from the very top to the bottom. What a pleasure it would be to load our Socialists, Communists, and other political parasites on a craft and send them down the Potomac River and out by the capes.

If my colleagues will consider the 50 or more Government-owned corporations created by special acts of Congress and incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, Delaware, and other States, the necessity for reorganization is clearly evident.

If my colleagues will now bear in mind that we employ an army of high-salaried officials to operate these various corporations, and that their salaries are from six to twelve thousand dollars a year, the necessity for reorganization is urgent. If Congress can now realize that not one of these organizations or corporations is earning enough money to pay its expenses, but that Congress instead appropriates billions for their maintenance, an excuse may be found even by the majority of this Congress to cast this parasitic muddle adrift on the ocean of oblivion.

As you look upon the scores of new office buildings in the city of Washington, housing the various governmental activities, everyone will recognize that we will soon need a new Capital. What private concern in the United States is served with the same luxurious and magnificent offices as the Federal employees in Washington? I am sure that when the taxpayers realize that the Federal Government is employing over 120,000 people in this city alone, on high salaries, and in useless capacities, reorganization will be demanded by the taxpayers. I am, therefore, in favor of reorganizing the Government, replacing the present incompetent organization with a business-like administration no different from that employed in private industry. Government operating expenses should be reduced at least 75 percent, and leave us with 75 percent greater efficiency in the Government.

The idea of the Federal Government's employing publicity bureaus, to distribute Government propaganda, should be obnoxious to every American citizen. We expect advance agents to sell a circus, but I do not believe the public is ready to make Government ballyhoo a permanent department.

Reorganize or disband Federal bureaus and departments which employ a large number of specialists that work with graphs, plans, and statistics, and speak the words of Judah.

They are now insidiously undermining constitutional liberties by proposing old plans clothed in garments of deception. These plans are not only unsound but their failures may be found in history and viewed in the ruins of past governments. We are indeed far on the road to socialistic and despotic rule.

Disband the national publicity bureaus that portray strutting administration windjammers on the front pages of our newspapers, giving advice and promising relief to business, a most incongruous situation. These closehaired prophets if compelled to rely upon their own ingenuity, I venture to say, could not even run a peanut stand on a profitable basis. Yet they swagger through the land playing to and appealing for public sympathetic approval, so they may further club our business people into submission for the greater glory of the commune.

What is the purpose of the reorganization bill? Is it to reduce Government personnel? No. It will be increased instead. Is it to reduce the cost of the Federal Government? Absolutely not. It will instead increase the cost of the Federal Government. The real object of this bill is to deprive Congress of further power and centralize it in the Federal Government. This should be perfectly obvious to every Member in Congress. There is nothing now that hinders the President from reorganizing all the bureaus created for the past 6 years. This is clearly evident in the appointments which have been made since we came to Washington.

I ask my colleagues to name one of the new bureaus or departments over which Congress has the slightest control. I even find it difficult to make appointments with heads of the various departments. They are simply too important to interview Members of Congress. I, therefore, say the reorganization bill is for no other purpose than to bring about greater centralization and so provide for a socialistic or communistic government. Any Member of this House who supports the reorganization bill must bear in mind that he may find it difficult to explain such support to the people who sent him to Congress. My colleagues will find that our people are alive to the danger which is now threatening us, and it is quite possible that the same thing may happen in the United States that has happened in Germany.

A few days past, one of my colleagues on my right, after a criticism of the New Deal, said: "What can the Republican Party propose to improve upon the policy of the past 7 years?"

I believe such question is only just, particularly if one presumes to criticize. I shall now reply, as I did in one of my former speeches, by repeating the first four answers:

- (1) Give every State a republican form of government as the Constitution provides.
- (2) Have Congress resume its rightful position in relation to the people it represents.
- (3) Replace the money in circulation now with gold-secured currency and set aside a gold reserve as security for all money.
- (4) Congress should demand that the Federal Government cease from competing with private industries, because such competition destroys earning power and creates idleness.

I shall now add to this, for further consideration, the following:

- (a) Repeal the power of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to play with the national currency.
- (b) Demand an accounting for the $2,000,000,000 gold stabilization fund.
- (c) Repeal the power of the State Department to regulate international trade and to negotiate trade pacts and treaties.
- (d) Place a tariff on all competitive products so that our farmer and manufacturer may supply home markets.
- (e) Appraise and liquidate all Federal-owned private corporations which are now in competition with private industry. After appraisal, sell them to private industry where they rightfully belong, and in such manner restore the States' and people's rights.

(f) Apply the Sherman antitrust law to Federal monopolies, which are now greater monopolies than private industries themselves.

(g) Cease and desist from taking issue with or protecting special groups because of the voting power such groups may have.

(h) Appoint a composite board to revise the legal structure by weeding out useless unconstitutional laws.

I am opposed to the reorganization bill and shall vote "no."

As a Member of Congress I shall in the future adhere strictly to the Constitution, which, of course, I am doing as I vote against this measure. It is the duty of Congress to maintain and operate sound economical government and to see that State rights are respected by the Federal Government. That should be the first step in reorganization and will reduce the Federal Government's operative cost materially. The State governments would begin to function as they should for the general welfare of everybody concerned. After this is accomplished, Congress will find that the Federal Government in Washington can be run with 10,000 employees. This will leave many buildings empty and save the construction of new ones. It will lessen the traffic hazards in Washington and save lives. It will also restore a real republican democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GARTNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an address by John M. Flynn, of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio address delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

SECRET ARMIES

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot submit that request unless it is agreeable to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] who has been granted time to address the House under special order. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the request of the gentleman from California to address the House for 2 minutes?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California for 2 minutes.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled by the membership of this House that each of us received a copy of the book Secret Armies. This book was sent to us by Walter Winchell, that untiring foe of real un-Americanism, whether it be from the extreme right or from the other side. There are those who would have us dismiss the information given in this book as being merely Communist propaganda. But as I have stated before on this floor, when such an outstanding American, known for his blasts against communism as well as fascism in both his columns and over the air, requests in his letter to us that we "wake up," it seems to me high time that we give this very important subject some consideration.

In the hope that our Congressmen and our special committee will do something about this thing, I wish to quote from a recent radio address by Mr. Winchell:

Ladies and gentlemen, I want to thank the numerous Senators and Congressmen for their letters acknowledging a book I sent them this week entitled "Secret Armies." It alleges that certain groups in this country are plotting against our Government. It names names. Some Congressmen, however, suspect the author. They allege he is a Communist and his book red propaganda. Some other Congressmen said they thought the author's charges should be investigated anyhow. And that's exactly what I thought. And the only reason I sent it. But this is more important. The New York Times on March 1 reported that Mexico seized eight persons in a spy plot. These eight suspects—and I hope the Senators and Congressmen are listening now—are mentioned in Secret Armies. Named in detail on pages 50 to 53.

In the same broadcast, Winchell, answering a lady's query, said that Mrs. Dilling's book exposing Communists, "The Red Network" by title, had already been given national attention and that he thought the Congress had heard of that book. Mr. Winchell's sign-off was:

Your New York correspondent who is happy to know that Congress is wise to the traitors who wrap themselves in the American flag so they can rap the principles for which it stands.

My object in presenting this this morning is twofold: First, that the Record will be straight and there will be no misunderstanding concerning Winchell's Americanism and his purpose in sending to us copies of Secret Armies. Second, it is my desire that the Congress and the country at large be awakened to the fact that it is high time that something be done about un-American activities. We have a committee with $100,000 at its disposal, and we have every reason to expect that committee to go into action. I do not believe that the country desires this thing to be delayed until the Congress has adjourned and public sentiment has subsided.

I believe that the writer of the book Secret Armies should be immediately subpoenaed and the documentary evidence which he claims he has been carefully sifted and legislation recommended at once to safeguard our democratic institutions. I am sure the Members of this House and the committee will agree with me when I say that attacks on our democracy will not be tolerated regardless of the direction from which they come, even though they may be camouflaged under the guise of patriotism.

I do not wish this to be construed as an attack upon the committee, but I feel that the subject is so vital that no time should be lost before taking action. [Applause.]

MONTANA DAY IN HOUSE RESTAURANT

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Montana for 1 minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I dare say that every employee on Capitol Hill has, at one time or another, heard of the rapturous beauty of snow-capped mountains, of rippling trout streams and the scenic wonderland of Montana, the land of the shining mountains.

Today I have the envious honor of inviting our honorable and beloved Speaker, Members of the House, gentlemen and gentlewomen of the press, and officers and employees of the House to taste the wildlife of my home State of Montana. Of course, our wildlife in Montana is not the same as you have here in the East.

The choice elk has been fattened on that rare, nutritious buffalo grass that abounds and grows along the rivers, streams, and in the imposing shadows of mountain peaks, peaks rising in silent majesty and vying with each other for the first kiss of the rays of the morning sun. Peaks which penetrate the clouds and, as someone has said, tickle the feet of the angels. The elk was fattened on an area adjacent to the magic land of our Nation, the matchless of all parks, Yellowstone.

Through the courtesy of the Gardiner (Mont.) Commercial Club, which is the Gardiner entrance to Yellowstone National Park, the delicious elk meat, cooked to please the palate of the most critical epicurean, will be the piece de resistance in the House restaurant on Tuesday noon of this week.

Today has been designated as Montana day in the House restaurant. You will be guests of the land where "There's never a horse that couldn't be rode, nor never a cowboy that couldn't be thrown." My colleague from Montana, Dr. THORKE, and I consider it a privilege to carry out the desires of the Gardiner Commercial Club. And after the adjournment of Congress, we invite each one of you to view the natural habitat of the elk where nature is on parade the year around. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record upon the bill now under consideration, and to include therein some data with reference to the Rural Electrification Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the legislative business of the day, I be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein a recital of progress of the Public Works Administration in region No. 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include an address delivered by Hon. Harry B. Hawes, former Member of the House and ex-United States Senator from Missouri before the Missouri Society on February 25.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TENEROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks memorializing the seventh anniversary of the death of John Philip Sousa.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include therein excerpts from a report of Hudson Biery, chairman of the stream purification committee of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, on the subject of Pollution of the Ohio River, before the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by printing in the Record a short dissertation by a very learned professor on taxation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF NEW DEAL

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I wish to thank the Speaker and Members of the House for their gracious action in granting to me unanimous consent to speak at this time.

Last Friday was the end of the sixth year, and last Saturday, March 4, was the sixth anniversary of President Roosevelt's administration. During all of those 6 years he has had an overwhelming majority in the House and Senate. Is it not appropriate to review the record made during these 6 eventful and fateful years?

On the first, second, third, and fourth anniversaries of the New Deal our New Deal friends were unable to find words to express adequately their admiration for their policies and their chief exponent, President Roosevelt. To them March 4, 1933, was the dawn of the new day. It was the beginning of all progress, prosperity, and the era of peace on earth and good will to men. We were led to believe that the calendar would be changed and we would cease to reckon time from A. D. 1 and change it to F. D. R. 1.

But on the fifth anniversary of the New Deal—March 4, 1938—our New Deal enthusiasts were as silent as the tomb in the proverbial country churchyard. This has been true of the sixth anniversary—March 4, 1939, except a certain Senator, and he ought to do so. It has meant more to him than any man in the Nation. [Applause.]

Have our New Deal friends been silenced by the logic of the cold facts? They were confronted a year ago, and they are now, with conditions and not theories. They know now that these New Deal policies have failed miserably. Some of our New Deal friends may feel that I am unkind in calling the country's attention to the conditions now facing us. I shall confine my remarks to the record and the facts. If the record and the facts are unkind to the New Deal it is no fault of mine. The new dealers themselves had the power and they made the record and brought about the conditions. They should not be unwilling to face the record as it is. If the record will not bear the close public scrutiny, and if it cannot be commended, it is the duty of the new dealers to meet the situation fairly and honestly and to cooperate with the Republicans and others to change the course. The American people do not look with approval on any party or man who runs away from the record.

BEAUTIFUL PROMISES AND SOLEMN PLEDGES

Due to the World War and speculation, this Nation in October 1929 was overwhelmed by the world-wide depression. We were in this depression in 1932.

The Democratic convention which met in Chicago in 1932 and Governor Roosevelt condemned in unmeasured terms as the cause of our depression the exorbitant taxes, wasteful expenditures, useless bureaus, commissions, and office holders, deficits, increase of the national debt, governmental interference with business, and restriction of agricultural production. They adopted a forthright platform and pledged to the country rigid economy, reduction of taxes, elimination of deficits, keeping expenditures strictly within the income, abolition of useless bureaus, commissions, and offices, reduction of the expenses of the Government at least 25 percent, the maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced, and less government in business. President Roosevelt, referring to that Democratic platform, immediately declared:

That admirable document which you have adopted is clear. I accept it 100 percent.

He further said:

A party platform is a covenant with the people, to be faithfully kept by a party when entrusted with power.

In a telegram dated July 8, 1933, to Hon. Leon McCord, member of the Democratic National Committee from Alabama, the President again asserted:

Finally, I have made it clear ever since my nomination a year ago that I subscribe to the Democratic platform 100 percent.

He stated in his acceptance speech of July 2, 1932:

For 3 long years I have been going up and down the land preaching that government costs too much.

And at Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 19, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt declared:

That (the Hoover spending), my friends, is the most reckless and extravagant pace I have ever been able to discover in the statistical record of any peacetime government anywhere, any time.

He further said in his Pittsburgh speech:

Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, in tax-sold farms, and hence in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy, or (as now) in broad cessation of employment. * * * Our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxation.

In a speech at Sioux City, Iowa, on September 29, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said:

I shall use this position of high responsibility to discuss up and down the country at all seasons, at all times, the duty of reducing taxes. * * * This I pledge you, and nothing I have said in the campaign transcends in importance this covenant with the taxpayers of this country.

And he further announced in his Pittsburgh speech:

Before any man enters my Cabinet, he must give me a pledge—absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform and especially to its economy plank. * * *

In commenting on the alleged wasteful administration of President Hoover, he said in the same speech:

We find that the expenditure for the business of government in 1927 was $2,187,000,000 and, in 1931, $3,168,000,000.

He condemned this increase of less than $1,000,000,000 in 1931, with a depression on, over expenditures in 1927, when the country was prosperous.

The President, further commenting in his speeches on governmental expenditures, said:

I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues of this campaign. In my opinion it is the most direct and effective contribution that government can make to business.

Let us bear in mind that when these declarations were made by President Roosevelt and this platform was written, the country was then in a depression and had been for 3 years. The President and his party realized the conditions, and they were giving to the country the policies they proposed to follow to restore prosperity to industry and employment to the idle workers of this country.

With this forthright platform and its 100 percent acceptance by Mr. Roosevelt and his reiterations throughout the country to carry out to the letter this platform, the American people elected him—with an overwhelming majority in the House and Senate. Still having this high purpose in mind, the President, in his message to Congress on March 10, 1933, said:

For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road to bankruptcy. For the fiscal year 1931 the deficit was $462,000,000. For the fiscal year 1932 it was $2,472,000,000. For the fiscal year 1933, it will probably exceed $1,200,000,000. * * * With utmost seriousness I point out to the Congress the profound effect of this fact upon our national economy. It has contributed to the recent collapse of our banking structure. It has accentuated the stagnation of the economic life of our people. It has added to the ranks of the unemployed. Our Government's house is not in order. Upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government rests the safety of deposits, the security of insurance policies, the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of our agricultural products, and the availability of employment. The credit of the United States Government definitely affects these fundamental human values. It therefore becomes our first concern to make secure the foundation. National recovery depends upon it. Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger. It is too late for a leisurely approach to this problem. We must not wait to act several months hence—we must move with a direct and resolute purpose now.

These earnest pledges and statesmanlike policies and the simple and direct declarations of the President in his first message caused the American people to believe that Mr. Roosevelt would carry out to the letter the solemn covenant of the Democratic platform, and his own unequivocal pledges inspired the American people with high hopes that prosperity would be restored and that pay rolls would take the place of relief rolls.

The President proceeded to put this platform and message into action by pushing through the Congress promptly what is known as the Economy Act of March 20, 1933. The salaries of officials and employees of the Government were reduced, the pensions, compensations, and hospitalization benefits of hundreds of thousands of veterans and their widows and orphans were cut off. It appeared as though the President meant what he said. It might be added, in passing, that the salaries of the officers who are employed by the Government were restored in due course of time, while, although some of the pensions, compensations, and hospitalization benefits of veterans have been restored, hundreds of thousands have not been restored. The disabled veterans and their widows and orphans were the only groups that finally had to bear the brunt.

RIGHTABOUT-FACE

Alas and alack! in less than 2 short months a great and singular change came over the President. That "admirable document," the Democratic platform, was forgotten, and all of those solemn pledges were repudiated. On May 12, 1933, a subservient Congress turned over to the President a blank check of $1,500,000,000, followed on June 16, 1933, by another blank check for $3,300,000,000, and in February 1934 by another blank check for $750,000,000. In less than 9 months after his message to Congress he was given direct authority to spend more than $6,000,000,000. This is nearly double the sum President Hoover spent for all purposes for the fiscal year 1931, which was denounced by Candidate Roosevelt.

Early in 1935 the President was given another blank check for $4,880,000,000. He has been given additional blank checks at various times during the last 6 years amounting, in all, to approximately $20,000,000,000. This is more than 10 times the amount of lump-sum appropriations given to the other 30 Presidents, in war and peace. There have been turned over to this administration, to be expended in the 6 years ending June 30, 1939, more than $57,000,000,000. And in addition thereto more than $5,000,000,000 of bonds and securities have been issued and sold by the various Federal agencies, the principal and interest of which have been guaranteed by the Federal Government. If the present session of Congress appropriates no more than President Roosevelt has called for in his Budget and other messages, an additional $10,000,000,000 will be appropriated, so that for the 7 years of the Roosevelt administration there will have been appropriated and turned over to his administration more than $67,000,000,000. This is an enormous sum of money. We cannot appreciate how much it is. It is a sum greater than was appropriated by all the Congresses under 26 other Presidents from March 4, 1789, under George Washington, down to the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918—more than 129 years. With that vast sum of money the 26 Presidents paid off the debt of the Revolution, fought the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, the World War, and all of our Indian wars. We bought the Louisiana Territory, Florida, the Gadsden Purchase, Alaska, the Philippine Islands, and Puerto Rico. We dug the Panama Canal; spent billions of dollars improving our rivers, harbors, and highways; built a merchant marine fleet; and paid the veterans and their widows and orphans their pensions; and carried on all the activities of the Government.

The national debt when Mr. Roosevelt assumed control was less than $21,000,000,000. This sixth anniversary of the New Deal finds Mr. Roosevelt with a national debt of $39,850,000,000. It is generally agreed that the national debt, before June 30, 1939, will be at least $41,500,000,000, and by June 30, 1940, it will exceed $45,000,000,000, the debt limit as fixed by Congress during the World War. Mr. Roosevelt will then have added nearly $24,000,000,000 to the Hoover deficits about which he complained. Last year we had the highest expenditures in peacetime in this country. That will be exceeded this year.

BUDGET BALANCING POLICY ABANDONED

The importance of balancing the Budget and preserving the credit of the Nation and encouraging industry, agriculture, and employment, and making secure our bank deposits, life-insurance policies, and so forth, was emphasized by the Democratic platform and the President's pledges. For 5 years of the President's administration he insisted from time to time that the Budget would be balanced; but in his recent message to Congress on January 4, 1939, he abandoned all pretense of a policy to balance the Budget.

The deficit this year will be approximately $3,000,000,000 and next year will perhaps reach $4,000,000,000. He is definitely committed to the unsound, impractical economic policy that we can tax, borrow, and spend ourselves into prosperity. This in the teeth of the platform of 1932 and the President's pledges.

Mr. Roosevelt and his party vigorously criticized the heavy revenues collected by the Hoover administration. The amount of Federal revenues collected for the last year under Hoover was $1,871,000,000. The amount of Federal revenues collected for the last fiscal year was $6,018,000,000. This is an increase of more than 230 percent.

The New Deal created more bureaus and commissions than any or all of the Presidents. Counting those engaged in the field in the Agricultural Department, it increased the number of officeholders from less than 550,000 under Hoover to more than 1,100,000.

Our New Deal friends claim these repudiations of their pledges were necessary to restore prosperity and give employment to the millions of idle workers.

REPUDIATION AND FAILURE

There has never been such a complete repudiation of the platform and pledges of any party or any candidate, and neither has there ever been such a tragic failure of the policies of any party or President of this country. We shall consider the results achieved under some of the major policies of the administration.

RELIEF ROLLS INCREASE

The House hearings on emergency relief in April 1938 show that in January 1933 there were 18,224,000 people requiring some form of public relief. March 1938 it stood at 20,112,000. It is generally admitted that relief reached the high peak the week of the November election 1938. Senator BYRD, of Virginia, in a syndicated article some time ago asserted that each month the Government mailed out more than 13,000,000 checks, and that the number of those receiving some form of relief from the Government and their dependents exceeded 40,000,000.

RAILROADS, MINES, AND WORKERS

The largest employers of workers in industry are the railroads of the country. The Interstate Commerce Commission's reports and records show that on January 1, 1932, there were 1,080,027 railroad workers at work. In 1937 this number had increased to 1,101,003, but by the middle of January 1939 the number of employed workers had dropped to 927,770. In other words the number of employed railroad workers decreased from January 1937 to January 1939, 173,253, and there are 150,000 less railroad workers employed now than in 1932 under the Hoover administration.

The records of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that we have approximately 240,000 miles of class A railroads.

On December 31, 1932, there were 22,545 miles of class A railroads in the hands of receiverships or trusteeships. December 31, 1933, the first year of the Roosevelt administration, there were 41,698 miles; on December 31, 1935, there were 68,345 miles; December 31, 1937, there were 70,884 miles. These records show that between January 1 and July 31, 1938, eight more class A railroads, operating 7,288 miles, went into bankruptcy, and we are advised that several thousand more miles went into receiverships or trusteeships since July 1938. So that today more than 30 percent of our class A railroads are in the hands of the courts under receiverships or trusteeships. The New York Central Railroad Co. reports as of March 1, 1939, a net deficit of $20,154,357 for 1938, compared to a net income of $6,352,612 for 1937.

In 1932, the low-water mark of the depression, there were 406,380 miners at work in the soft-coal industry. In March 1938 there were 374,000, a decrease of 32,000. In 1929 there were produced 539,989,000 tons of bituminous coal. In 1937 there were produced 442,455,000. In 1938 there were produced only 342,479,000 tons of bituminous coal. It will be observed that there were produced 100,048,000 less tons of soft coal in 1938 than in 1937, and 192,582,000 less tons in 1938 than in 1929.

The National Bituminous Coal Commission states that the soft-coal industry lost approximately $37,000,000 in 1937, and it is estimated that it lost $60,000,000 in 1938.

The administration put through the Guffey Coal Act about 2 years ago, set up a large and expensive bureau which has cost the Government and coal producers more than $20,000,000 to carry on this activity, but up until this time no prices have been finally fixed and the coal industry has not been stabilized.

THE BLIGHTING EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT COMPETITION

The Government is now actively engaged in competition with its citizens in 250 different lines of business, and is increasing day by day.

President Roosevelt, in a Nation-wide hook-up radio speech March 2, 1930, in his famous States' rights speech, warned the people against the concentration of power in Washington in the hands of master minds, and denounced the Federal Government's interference in business. Let us see what general effect the New Deal's interference with business has had. There were 670 business failures in June 1937, and 1,018 such failures in June 1938. Comparing June 1938 with June 1937, there was a decline in industrial production, wholesale commodities, steel production, freight-car loadings, department-store sales, automobile production, ranging all the way from 32 percent in industrial production to 65 percent in automobile production.

In 1937 the net earnings of the steel industry was $181,000,000; in 1938 it was a little over $1,000,000—a drop in earnings of more than 99 percent.

From 1921 to 1929, with private capital and private initiative, there were constructed during that period 2,010,304 dwelling houses valued at $16,752,000,000, an average of 223,367 houses annually. Now let us see what the New Deal did with the building industry. The number of dwelling houses constructed from 1933 to 1938 with Federal and private capital was 463,928, with a value of $2,516,000,000—an annual average of 77,321. Under private enterprise there were three times as many dwellings built each year as there were under Federal and private capital, and that meant that private enterprise provided for the use of more capital and materials and created more jobs.

WE GO DEEPER WHILE GREAT BRITAIN AND OTHER COUNTRIES RECOVER

According to the monthly bulletins of statistics issued by the League of Nations, based on industrial production of 1929, using 100 as the ratio, in March 1936 Japan had recovered and advanced 51 points ahead of her condition in 1929, Great Britain 15 points, but the United States still lagged 22 points below 1929. In February 1938 Japan was still 50 points, Great Britain had increased to 19 points, and the United States had further declined from 22 to 34 points below 1929. In March 1936 we were thirteenth among the nations in recovery; in 1938 we were seventeenth.

Therefore, viewed from any and every angle, the New Deal policies of reform, according to the record, have failed.

ELEVEN TO THIRTEEN MILLION UNEMPLOYED WORKERS

President Roosevelt in his campaign of 1932 never claimed there were more than 11,000,000 unemployed workers. The American Federation of Labor reported in April 1938 there were 11,064,660 unemployed workers. The latest Government figures, released in the New York Times June 5, 1938, fixed the unemployed in 1938 somewhere between 12,000,000 and 12,500,000. John L. Lewis, of the C. I. O., declared in 1938 there were more than 13,000,000. I have heard a number of our New Deal friends on the floor of the House at various times in the last year assert there were somewhere between 12,000,000 and 16,000,000 unemployed wage earners. As I understand, these do not include the 1,000,000 or more tenant farmers; the work of themselves and families was taken from them under the New Deal cut-out farm policy. In my section of the country there are more people out of work now than there have been at any time since the depression began in 1929.

FARM POLICIES HAVE BEEN DISASTROUS TO AGRICULTURE

In 1932 the President denounced the suggestion made by some official in the Hoover administration that it might help the farmers to allow 20 percent of the wheat lands to lie idle, plow up every third row of cotton, and shoot every tenth dairy cow. The President characterized that proposal as "a cruel joke."

In wanton violation of his platform and his declaration, the President forced through many so-called agricultural relief acts. Some of them imposed a tax of 30 cents a bushel on corn and wheat, about 2 cents a pound on cotton, and from 2 to 6 cents a pound on tobacco; 6,200,000 pigs and 220,000 mother sows were slaughtered; millions of cattle and sheep were killed; from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 acres of productive land were taken out of production.

This administration has paid out altogether to aid agriculture nearly $6,000,000,000. Let us not forget that President Roosevelt condemned in unmeasured terms the extravagance of the Hoover Farm Board. The Hoover Farm Board was granted a revolving fund of $500,000,000. That Board made loans to the farmers amounting to $1,500,000,000, but on December 1, 1937, there still remained $175,000,000 of the original fund. The Hoover Board cost the taxpayers $325,000,000, but the Roosevelt program has cost the taxpayers approximately $6,000,000,000.

The question arises, What has been the result of the Roosevelt farm policies? Has it in the long run hurt or helped agriculture? Because of the lack of time, I can direct the attention of the House and the country only to those farm commodities that have received the greatest benefits—cotton, corn, and wheat.

Cotton has been favored over all other farm commodities. Before the cotton-control acts and cut-outs we supplied 53 percent of the cotton of the world. Today we supply less than 40 percent. We exported 8,500,000 bales annually. In 1938 we exported approximately 4,000,000 bales, and our export in 1939 will be less. The Government this year will incur an outlay of $225,000,000 for benefit payments on acreage curtailment and for adjustment payments on cotton. The taxpayers will have to shoulder a burden of $1,200,000,000 on cotton alone. As we cut down our production of cotton Brazil, Egypt, and other countries were encouraged and increased their acreage. As the cotton growers in this country cut down their acreage, through the liberal use of fertilizer, much of it indirectly furnished by the Government, we increased our production so that for the crop year 1937, with the cotton-control act and the cut-out, it reached the peak of 18,476,000 bales, and for the crop year 1938 it was 18,164,000 bales, and while we were increasing our production in bales of cotton our export trade was cut down one-half more.

The Government has been paying the cotton producers 3 cents a pound as a bonus and lending 9 cents more on the pound, while the average market price of cotton was about 8 cents a pound. The Government made loans on millions and millions of bales of cotton. The owners of the cotton have the right to let the Government take the cotton in discharge of the debt. The net result is we have accumulated in the neighborhood of 12,000,000 bales of cotton. This cotton has cost the Government, counting the bounty, more than $500 a bale, and with carrying charges annually of about $3.50 a bale. The price is down to 8 cents, and the indications are that the price is going lower. Our export trade is being cut down day by day. The Government and the cotton growers are in a quandary. The Government cannot afford to hold the cotton, and it will further depress the market for the Government to sell the cotton.

One of the outstanding editors in the cotton State of Texas, in a recent issue, had this to say about the New Deal cotton program:

The plain truth about the crop control so far as cotton is concerned is that it is already a complete failure, judged solely in the light of the objectives of its supporters. It has not restored the income of the cotton farmers, it has not restored and maintained prices, and it has not permanently reduced the unconsumed surplus of American cotton. The difference between the prices and income prevailing today and those of the low point in 1932 are entirely due to the devaluation of the dollar and not to the control program.

The cotton industry is demoralized and the Government will sustain a tremendous loss.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. It might be interesting if at this point the gentleman's remarks showed that while the prices at which the farmers sell have depreciated 50 percent in 2 years his cost of living has increased 100 percent.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I thank the gentleman.

Cotton is the fair-haired child of the administration. This policy, it must be now admitted, has ruined the cotton industry in this country.

What about wheat and corn? They are lending perhaps 20 cents more a bushel on wheat and corn than the corn can be bought for in the western country. Is not that true? I ask my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Considerably more.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The Government is loaning to corn growers 57 cents a bushel when as a matter of fact any quantity of corn can be bought for 35 cents a bushel at the place of production. The Government is likewise making loans on wheat at a price greatly in excess of what the wheat can be bought for; and the Government is accumulating a lot of corn and wheat and is going to have more.

Let us bear in mind that the Government contributed more to agriculture in 1937 and 1938 than at any other time. The President forced through the Reciprocal Trade Act which is vigorously opposed, as I understand, by all the great farm organizations. Under this measure the tariff protection to the farmers was broken down and there were shipped into this country from foreign lands $2,000,000,000 worth of farm products in direct competition with the farmers of this country. We created an attractive market in this country and then opened it up to the farmers of foreign lands. It would have required every acre of the millions of productive acres that were taken out of production to produce the farm products that were shipped into this country.

What was the net result on corn and wheat? The price of No. 1 cash wheat delivered at Chicago on March 1, 1937, was $1.52—on February 28, 1939, it was 70 cents. Top corn delivered at Chicago March 1, 1937, was $1.25 a bushel—on March 1, 1939, it was 47¾ cents a bushel. You will observe there has been a decrease of more than 50 percent on wheat and corn since March 1937. I cannot take the time to give a comparison of prices on other farm commodities.

The farmers' cash income of this country for 1937, including Government payments, was approximately $8,500,000,000, and the farmers' cash income in 1938, including Government payments which were larger in 1938 than in 1937, was approximately $7,500,000,000. Under the New Deal farm policies, the more the Government puts out, the less the farmers' income is. The farmers' income was a billion dollars less in 1938 than in 1937, and Secretary Wallace and others predict that the farmers' income and farmers' prices will be less in 1939 than they were in 1938.

Is not that true, Mr. ANDRESEN, the farmers' friend from Minnesota?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is true.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. The farm income figures the gentleman gave included the farm benefits taken out of the taxpayers' pockets, did they not?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Oh, certainly. We have now got on our hands millions of bales of cotton, and it cost us over $500,000,000. The Government cannot sell it or prices may go down to 4 cents, or even less. It costs the Government $3.50 a year carrying charges, just to store the cotton—nearly $40,000,000 a year.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. And yet we are importing cotton at the present time.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Absolutely. Some of it came to Louisville in my home State.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. And cottonseed, and cotton-seed oil.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Absolutely.

In 1925 and 1926, under a Republican administration, with no cut-outs, no reciprocal-trade agreements, and no Government payments, the farmers' income was approximately $12,000,000,000. Let us not overlook the fact that the farmers' income and prices in 1925, 1926, and 1932 were on the basis of the honest 100-cent gold dollar. These prices we have quoted on corn, wheat, cotton, and the income are on the basis of the 59-cent dollar. The dollar was devalued for the purpose of raising prices. The cheaper dollar, the higher the prices. On the devalued dollar, the farmers' income of 1938 as compared to the 100-cent dollar was less than $4,500,000,000, and the price of wheat less than 45 cents a bushel on February 28, 1939, and corn less than 30 cents a bushel, and cotton less than 5 cents a pound.

And those prices were honest 100-cent dollars. The low prices of today, the low income, are measured in the 59-cent dollars. There is a tremendous difference.

Mr. KNUTSON. And when the former prices were realized it was not under the stimulus of Government benefits.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The farmers of this country have not only lost their liberty, their markets, and their prices, but at the same time the New Deal administration has cast upon them a tremendous load in the way of increased taxes, deficits, and debts that must continue to be a burden to them, their children, and their children's children even unto the fourth generation.

ANOTHER RIGHTABOUT-FACE

The administration, faced with a drop in our income from $69,000,000,000 in 1937 to $62,000,000,000 in 1938, and the deplorable plight of agriculture and industry and the great army of unemployed and those on relief, and perhaps more especially by the warning of the last November elections, has made another rightabout-face. They claim their program of reform is over and they now propose to devote themselves to recovery. The Republicans, anti-New Deal Democrats, many farm groups, business interests, and workers have been urging all along that the New Deal had the cart before the horse. The new dealers were insisting on reform—changing our form of government and the fundamental principles upon which this Nation was based and on which it has become the greatest industrial, agricultural, and commercial nation in the world. The opposition insisted that the first important thing was to bring about recovery, change relief rolls into pay rolls, cut out punitive taxes, unnecessary handicaps and regulations, and instead of the hostile attitude and constant assault and abuse urged upon capital, industry, and business, these should be encouraged, because in the final analysis industry, agriculture, and commerce must provide the real jobs and real wages.

The President, Secretary Morgenthau, and Secretary Hopkins tell the country no new taxes and no further reform legislation are contemplated. I wonder if they are motivated by the fact that the Seventy-sixth Congress will not stand for any more half-baked, fantastic legislation and is unwilling to give to this administration more taxes to squander. Or have these new dealers seen the handwriting on the wall in 1940? Industry, agriculture, and commerce have been bound hand and foot. They must now overcome the blighting influences of the New Deal as well as the depression. The new dealers say that no new taxes are contemplated at this time, but they do say they propose to continue the policy of borrowing and squandering. In fact, the President insists that this is the road to recovery. There is no suggestion that any of these emergency powers granted to the President whereby industry and agriculture have been regimented and the activities of 130,000,000 people placed into the hands of the bureaucrats here in Washington shall be relinquished—no suggestion to cut out any useless bureaus, commissions, and the hundreds of thousands of useless officeholders, or to remove governmental competition and interference with business and agriculture—no suggestion about reduction of Federal expenditures or the maintenance of the national credit by the Federal Budget annually balanced. The Democratic platform and the President, in 1932, announced that these policies and these alone could restore business and bring back prosperity, start the idle factories, and provide employment.

Under the President's borrowing and spending policy, though there may be no new taxes this year they must come next year or the year after—either that or worse, inflation, and that means in the end repudiation.

How can the administration in good faith insist that its chief purpose is recovery without a rightabout-face of its unsound policies of the last 6 years?

The Republican Party has always stood ready and willing to help take care of the needy of the Nation that cannot take care of themselves and to cooperate wholeheartedly with the administration in a sane, honest policy to bring about recovery.

Mr. REED of New York. The deficit has run during this period to over nineteen and one-half billion dollars and soon will be over $22,000,000,000.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; that is true.

GOLD AND SILVER PURCHASE FOLLY

Under the Constitution the Congress is given the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. A New Deal Congress surrendered this power to the President.

The Government had approximately $7,000,000,000 in gold. Under the power given him to fix the gold content of the dollar, the President fixed it at 59.6 cents and forced everybody that had gold or gold certificates to surrender to the Government their 100-cent dollars in gold and take in exchange a paper dollar worth only 59.6 cents. The administration then boasted of the fact that they had made over 40 cents on every dollar, and a total profit of $2,800,000,000.

We have denounced the German Government for making an assessment of 20 cents on the dollar against the Jewish people. This policy of our Government merely penalized to the extent of 40 percent the holders of gold or gold certificates. Dictators centuries ago did their people the same way, but history has never approved their conduct.

The President was also authorized to buy gold and silver without limit and fix the price thereof. Gold was less than $21 an ounce. He fixed the price at $35 and has bought more than $7,000,000,000 worth of gold at $35 an ounce. This has caused new gold mines to open and others to increase their output throughout the world. We buy all gold offered. Perhaps 80 percent of the gold we have bought at this enormous price has come from foreign lands. In the last 5 years this Nation has bought 30 percent more gold than all the new gold produced in the world in the 5 years. Then we took the gold and buried it in the ground down in Kentucky.

The President has followed the same policy as to silver. He has bought nearly 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver, over 80 percent of it coming from silver mines of foreign countries, and has paid from 20 cents to 40 cents an ounce more than the market value of the silver. The New Deal, with its heavy bounties out of the money of the taxpayers of America, has enriched tremendously the foreign producers of silver and gold.

The Government is now in a quandary. It has fixed these enormous prices for gold and silver and has bought these large amounts of gold and silver. If it stops buying, the market will drop and our Government will lose billions of dollars. If it continues to buy, we are only postponing the day of a greater disaster.

It is claimed that these policies were adopted in order to increase prices, especially of farm products. The market quotations show how this policy has failed.

The administration cannot go on with this and it cannot stop. It is like the man who caught the bear by the tail. The administration will not stop unless forced to by Congress. When it does stop and the price of gold and silver drops, the American people will discover this to be the greatest folly of all the follies of the New Deal.

INCREASE TO $50,000,000,000 NATIONAL DEBT LIMIT URGED

The President, Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, and others are now, in peacetime, urging this Congress to raise the debt limit of $45,000,000,000 to not less than $50,000,000,000. Why? Because the national debt on June 30, 1940, will go beyond the $45,000,000,000 limit.

How are they going to get the money? Borrow it. They know they have soaked the rich and the poor with taxes to the limit. They propose now to fool the people. Their plan is merely to add further burdens to us, to our children, and to our children's children.

If the Nation could not recover and employment was prevented and industry and agriculture stagnated, and we were on our road to bankruptcy with the $4,000,000,000 of deficits and less than $21,000,000,000 of national debt under Hoover, on what road are we now traveling?

What is there in the administration's present course to encourage capital to reinvest and industry and agriculture to expand? What encouragement is there to business with Hopkins as Secretary of Commerce, Murphy as Attorney General, and Amlie on the Interstate Commerce Commission?

JEFFERSON, JACKSON, LINCOLN

The President's Jackson Day Belshazzar feast, January 8, 1939, when he and his New Deal friends ate off the golden plates at $100 a plate, told in his speech he had called up the great hero, Andrew Jackson, the patron saint of the Democratic Party, and Andy had patted him on the back and told him "to go to it, Franklin, old boy," the President insisted that Jackson, Jefferson, and Lincoln, like himself, were real liberal Democrats. The policies of the New Dealers are as alien to the policies of Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln as could be. These three great Americans were always preaching against high Federal debt, high taxes, and regimentation. They insisted that a nation is best governed that is least governed. They fought bureaucracy and championed the rights of the people. They condemned Federal debt as dangerous and high taxes as oppressive to the people.

I have before me a statement showing what they did with the public debt. When Jefferson became President the national debt was $83,038,050.80. When he retired he had cut the national debt to $57,023,109.09. When Jackson assumed office the national debt was $58,421,413.67. In a few years Jackson had reduced the national debt to $37,513.05. The national debt on June 30, 1861, was $90,582,417. On June 30, 1865, including the 4 years of the Civil War and having had nearly 3,000,000 men under arms for 4 years, the national debt was $1,578,551,169.

This administration has increased the national debt more in 4 months in peacetime than Lincoln increased it in 4 years of civil war.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The recovery of our material wealth is one thing, but the recovery of our spiritual morale is another.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I was coming to that. They have not only threatened the credit of this country but they have broken the self-reliance, the morale, and the spirit of millions of American people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a number of us are here listening to the gentleman and we are enjoying the address. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]?

There was no objection.

DANGER HERE, NOT OVER THERE

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. After almost 2 months the President and many of the leaders of the administration have been busy announcing foreign governments rattling their sabers and joining in the jingo chorus. He has asked huge sums for alleged emergency national defense and there has been much talk that war will bring about prosperity.

A poll recently taken of the Congress of Editors of the 48 States and the District of Columbia, in which 1,139 participated, on the question as to whether or not we were being eased into another foreign war, 719 voted in the affirmative.

A great friend of the President in the United States Senate recently declared that if the American people knew what recently transpired in a secret conference with the present

Military Affairs Committee with reference to our entanglements with foreign countries and our commitments to them they would be shocked and stunned, and this statement was affirmed by another Senator who was present at that secret conference.

We all desire adequate defense of our country, but the American people are opposed to our entering another foreign war. If we are neutral and adhere to our historic foreign policies based upon the declaration of Washington and the Monroe Doctrine, we will avoid foreign wars. We have not yet, and will not for many years, recover from our last experience in a foreign war.

Let us devote our minds and resources to a solution of our problems here. With this great army of unemployed and countless millions of needy people in the richest country of the world, the menace to our Nation is here, and not over there.

This Nation is fortunate in its situation, 3,000 miles from Europe and 7,000 miles from Asia. It is the greatest agricultural, industrial, financial, and commercial country of the world. It surpasses all other nations in its natural resources and in the development of its transportation, industrial, and commercial enterprises. It has a courageous, intelligent people.

Yet with all this we have more wage earners unemployed and more people needing public relief than there are in any other great nation now or at any other time in the 50 centuries of the world's history.

This Nation has experienced other depressions. We recovered in 4 years. This depression has now run along for 10 years, with no end in sight. There must be something radically wrong with the leadership and the policies that cannot translate these resources and wealth into prosperity.

The Republican Party is ready to forego partisanship and to cooperate fully with the administration in solving these great domestic problems. Let us hold fast to that which is good and not hesitate to correct whatever is standing in the way of recovery and prosperity to the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the reorganization bill today may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I suggest that the gentleman permit every Member of the House to have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend his remarks?

Mr. COCHRAN. I withdraw the request and ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD on the reorganization bill under consideration today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I had a telephone message from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS] saying that he was unable to get over here in time to submit the request and asking me to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be permitted to sit during the session of the House tomorrow. I submit that request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CARTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Illinois say the minority members of the committee had been interviewed with reference to this request?

Mr. COCHRAN. I specifically asked if the gentleman had consulted the ranking minority member and he said he understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] had done so.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to inform the gentleman that is a mistake. As the ranking minority member who is here in the city at the present time, I know nothing about the request.

Mr. COCHRAN. I therefore withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article written by Dr. Watts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. OSMERS (at the request of Mr. POWERS) for 1 month, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), pursuant to the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 7, 1939, at 11 o'clock a. m.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Public hearings will continue Tuesday morning, March 7, 1939, at 10 a. m., on social-security legislation in the Ways and Means Committee room in the New House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Tuesday, March 7, 1939, at 10:30 a. m., in the committee rooms, Capitol, for the consideration of the following: S. 1523, burial expenses in connection with last illness and death of native employees who die while serving in executive offices abroad. House Resolution 107, requesting the President to furnish the House of Representatives data in regard to seizure of certain American property in Mexico.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs, in room 1310, New House Office Building, at 10:30 a. m., Tuesday, March 7, 1939, for the consideration of H. R. 2969, to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical raw materials, concentrates, and alloys essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical minerals in the United States, and for other purposes, and all allied bills as follows: H. R. 987, H. R. 1987, H. R. 2556, H. R. 3320, H. R. 2643, H. R. 4373, and H. R. 4505.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Tuesday, March 7, 1939. Business to be considered: Railroad rate differentials.

There will be a meeting of the Wool Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 2 p. m. Tuesday, March 7, 1939. Business to be considered: Opposition to wool labeling bill, H. R. 944.

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors will meet Tuesday, March 7, 1939, at 10:30 a. m., to continue hearings on H. R.

3222 and H. R. 3223, bills for the completion of the construction of the Atlantic-Gulf Ship Canal across Florida.

COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures will meet on Tuesday, March 7, 1939, at 10 a. m., in room 115, House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in room 445 of the House Office Building at 10:30 a. m. Wednesday, March 8, 1939, for the public consideration of H. R. 4100 and H. R. 4646, and on private bills H. R. 4353, H. R. 4354, H. R. 4357, and H. R. 4358.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs on Wednesday, March 8, 1939, at 10:30 a. m., for the consideration of H. R. 4535, H. R. 3367, H. R. 4403, and H. R. 4679.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will hold public hearings in room 219, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., at 10 a. m. Tuesday, March 7, 1939, on the bill (H. R. 4307) to extend the provisions of the Shipping Act, 1916, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, to all common carriers by water in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will hold public hearings in room 219, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., at 10 a. m., on the bills and dates listed below:

Tuesday, March 14, 1939:

H. R. 180, H. R. 202, construction of a Nicaraguan Canal; H. R. 201, additional facilities for Panama Canal; H. R. 2667, construction of a Mexican Canal.

In listing the bills to be heard on March 14, 1939, House Joint Resolution 112 (TINKHAM), to create a commission to study and report on the feasibility of constructing the Mexican Canal, was inadvertently omitted from the notice.

This is to advise all interested parties that House Joint Resolution 112 will be considered at that time with the following bills: H. R. 180 (IZAE), relative to the construction of a Nicaraguan Canal; H. R. 202 (BLAND), relative to the construction of a Nicaraguan Canal; H. R. 201 (BLAND), need for additional lock facilities at Panama; H. R. 2667 (TINKHAM), relative to the construction of a Mexican Canal.

Tuesday, March 21, 1939:

H. R. 137, H. R. 980, H. R. 1674, relating to annuities for Panama Canal construction force.

Thursday, March 23, 1939:

H. R. 141, H. R. 142, H. R. 1819, miscellaneous Panama Canal bills.

Tuesday, March 28, 1939:

H. R. 197, relating to the clearance of vessels; H. R. 199, relating to the allotment of wages by seamen; H. R. 200, relating to foreign towboats towing between American ports; H. R. 1780, relating to penalties on certain undocumented vessels and cargoes engaging in the coastwise trade or the fisheries; H. R. 1782, relating to change of masters of vessels.

Wednesday, March 29, 1939:

H. R. 198, relating to the measurement of vessels; and H. R. 132, authorizing the use of condemned Government vessels for breakwater purposes.

Tuesday, April 4, 1939:

H. R. 3209, making it a misdemeanor to stow away on vessels; H. R. 3398, regarding the down payment of construction of new vessels; H. R. 3935, relating to the discharge of seamen.

Wednesday, April 5, 1939:

H. R. 3052, uniform insignia for Naval Reserve radio operators.

COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on the Public Lands on Wednesday, March 15, 1939, at 10 a. m., in room 328, House Office Building, to consider H. R. 3794, to establish John Muir-Kings Canyon National Park, Calif., to transfer thereto the lands now included in the General Grant National Park, and for other purposes.

There will be a meeting of the Committee on the Public Lands on Thursday, March 23, 1939, at 10 a. m., in room 328, House Office Building, to consider H. R. 3759, to authorize a National Mississippi River Parkway and matters relating thereto.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Beginning at 10 a. m. on Wednesday, March 22, 1939, there will be a hearing held before the Subcommittee No. 4 of the Committee on the Judiciary on House Joint Resolution 176, declaring the conservation of petroleum deposits underlying submerged lands adjacent to and along the coast of California, below low-water mark and under the territorial waters of the United States of America, essential for national defense, maintenance of the Navy, and regulation and protection of interstate and foreign commerce; reserving the same as a naval petroleum reserve, subject to any superior vested right, title, or interest; and authorizing appropriate judicial proceedings to assert, ascertain, establish, and maintain the right and interest of the United States of America in such reserve and to eject trespassers.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

493. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting the draft of a proposed provision pertaining to the existing appropriation for the National Mediation Board for the fiscal year 1939 (H. Doc. No. 199); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

494. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the draft of a proposed bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove a floating dry dock from the United States Naval Station, New Orleans, La.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

495. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting the draft of a proposed bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make and carry out agreements of indemnity to banks paying him moneys to cover checks or drafts issued by such banks payable to the United States or an agency or officer thereof which have been or may be lost or destroyed; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. KING: Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. H. R. 159. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the naturalization of certain women born in Hawaii," approved July 2, 1932; without amendment (Rept. No. 122). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KING: Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. H. R. 160.
